Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

The Gerald R. Ford, Jr., house on Crown View Drive is located in an upper middle-class residential development of single-family homes in a suburb of Washington, D. C. It consists of a rectangular 2-story main block with a two-story extension at the east side built to house a garage and the master bedroom, and a one-story extension in the middle of the rear elevation. The exterior is faced with brick, except for wooden siding on the second floor front and on the gable of the rear extension. In the house are 7 rooms, 2 and 2/3 baths, and a finished basement room.

When the Fords had the house built and moved into it in 1955, theirs was the second house on the block.¹ The Fords themselves arranged for a builder to construct the house and reviewed floorplans for it. President Ford has credited Mr. Viktors Purins of Grand Rapids, Michigan, with the design of the house.² Mrs. Ford was unsatisfied with the landscaping provided by the builder, and upon construction of the house, she saw to much of the lawn and garden work.³ In 1961, the Fords installed a 20- x 40- foot swimming pool, which the President enjoyed regularly.

When Mr. Ford became Vice President, the Secret Service installed a "Command Post" in the garage of the house, and made a number of related changes. These included:

- bricking up of the entrance to the garage and installation of a bay window in the former entrance as an observation point;
- removal of a garage window and replacement of that window with an entrance for Secret Service access to the Command Post;
- installation of a half-bath, closet, and partition for the office/squad room of the Command Post, and of a sink/stove/refrigerator combination;
- installation of sound-proofing for the Command Post;
- installation of equipment needed for various protective equipment, including fire, smoke, and radiation detection systems, which were connected to a control console in the Command Post;

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Gerald R. Ford, Jr., and his family lived at 514 Crown View Drive, Alexandria, Virginia, from the time of their house's construction there until the Fords moved into the White House on August 19, 1974, ten days after Mr. Ford took the oath of office as President of the United States. During this period, Mr. Ford served as Representative of the 5th district of Michigan in the U. S. Congress, as House Minority Leader, and as Vice President of the United States. Though from 1950 to 1979 the Fords owned a house at 1624 Sherman Street in Grand Rapids in order to maintain residence in Mr. Ford's home district, the Alexandria house became the family's primary home.

While living in this house, the future President established himself as a long-standing leader in the Congress, building up the reputation that eventually led to his confirmation as Vice President. The house represents both the economic and social circumstances of the Fords' life through a nineteen-year period when Ford's Congressional career and the Ford children were both maturing. Since the Fords had the house built for them, the house also evidences the quality of their domestic life and arrangements in a particularly direct way.

FAMILY LIFE

Mr. and Mrs. Ford moved to Washington after he was elected to Congress in 1948. They lived in two apartments before moving to Crown View Drive. The first was at 2500 Q Street in Georgetown. The second, where they moved after the birth of their first child, Mike, in 1950, was in a complex of buildings in Virginia known as Parkfairfax. They moved there so that the child would have a better environment for play. Around the time of the arrival of a second son, Jack, the Fords considered buying a house. Mrs. Ford felt that the apartment was cramped, and "also, I thought it would be best for Mike, now that he was reaching grammar-school age, if we settled in one place. Jerry was not going home to Michigan, that was obvious. He planned to stay in Congress."⁷ This contrasted with earlier years, when the family spent substantial periods in Grand Rapids, and Mike attended a kindergarten there.⁸ The house at Crown View Drive thus was an important part of the development of a stable community and family life

In addition, the Fords' driveway was altered to accommodate the Vice Presidential Lincoln. Added to the bill for that job were charges for work on the house's brick sidewalk and front stoop and the brick steps to the Secret Service facility.⁶

The Ford house on Crown View Drive is typical of middle-class housing in the northern Virginia suburbs of Washington built during the past three decades. The changes made for the Secret Service must have seemed especially major and obtrusive in the Fords' prosperous but unpretentious house and neighborhood on Crown View Drive.

in Washington for the Fords. Mrs. Ford also commented on the growth of the family there:

If I'd known we were going to have two more babies, I'd have built more bedrooms and more bathrooms. And if I'd even considered the possibility that my little boys might grow up to be six foot something apiece, I'd have asked for thicker walls and higher ceilings.⁹

POLITICAL LIFE

President Ford's career in Congress developed while he lived in the Crown View Drive house. He had previously served on the Public Works Committee, and, in 1951, was named to the House Appropriations Committee. In 1963, he was selected as chairman of the House Republican Conference. He was permanent chairman of the Republican National Convention in 1968 and 1972. He became House Minority Leader in 1965, serving in that capacity until he became Vice President in 1973. He was also named to the Warren Commission, investigating the assassination of President Kennedy. Mr. Ford was at home on Crown View Drive when President Richard M. Nixon telephoned to tell him formally that he was Nixon's choice for the Vice Presidency.

When Ford was confirmed as Vice President in December, 1973, his new status brought changes in both his domestic and professional life. He and Mrs. Ford functioned as the Vice Presidential couple from their home on Crown View Drive. Though Congress had authorized use of the Admiral's Mansion at the Naval Observatory in Washington, D. C., as the official Vice Presidential residence, the Fords' preparations for moving to the mansion were cut short by President Nixon's resignation and Mr. Ford's assumption of the office of the Presidency. In the interim, Mrs. Ford used a corner of the Crown View Drive master bedroom as her social office. In at least one newspaper interview, she expressed a personal preference for remaining in her Alexandria home, rather than moving to the Naval Observatory.¹⁰

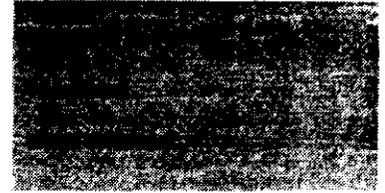

Secret Service personnel were, of course, assigned to the Fords when Mr. Ford took office as Vice President. The presence of the Secret Service and of

The Fords retained ownership of the Crown View house and rented it out, until they decided that upon leaving the White House they would settle in California, partly because they felt that Mrs. Ford's arthritis would improve in a hot, dry climate. On January 13, 1977, eight days before President Jimmy Carter's inauguration, President Ford wrote to the next owner of 514 Crown View Drive: "I am happy to hear that you will soon be the new owner of our Alexandria home.... Betty, the children, and I had many wonderful years in that home."¹⁵ Mrs. Ford reflected later about leaving their home of nineteen years:

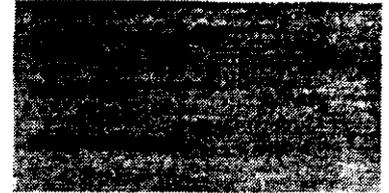

For me, leaving the White House wasn't nearly so much of a wrench as leaving our house in Alexandria. After we decided we weren't going to move back and put the house up for sale, I never went over there again. I didn't want to. We had built the place, the children had grown up there, all of our neighbors were friends. We'd been to so many block parties and Fourth of July celebrations, we'd planted gardens and put in trees, and I knew if I saw it again it would upset me. I wanted to think of my new life, to look forward.¹⁶
