SUMMARY DESCRIPTION

The Folly Castle Historic District as extended comprises approximately five blocks of a residential neighborhood on the west side of downtown Petersburg with a portion of West Washington Street at its center. There are seventy-three residences and contributing outbuildings in the expanded district and four non-residential buildings. The latter are: First Baptist and Second Presbyterian churches, the now-abandoned Petersburg High School (all of which front West Washington Street), and an abandoned store on Lafayette Street next to Brick House Run. Also included within the historic district are landscape features such as wooden and iron fences, tiled walks, and granite curbs. An elaborate cast-iron fence (a contributing object in the district) is located at the southeast corner of Hinton and Davis streets, a lone reminder of the grand Greek Revival mansion, known as the Dunlop House, that once occupied this elevated corner lot. The boundaries of the existing district include Second Presbyterian Church and residences fronting the north side of West Washington Street from Lafayette to Davis streets, the south side of West Washington Street from Guarantee to Perry streets, and the west side of Perry Street from Washington Street to West Wythe Street. The expanded district includes houses fronting Hinton Street from Hazel Street east to 235 Hinton Street, West Washington Street from Pine to Davis Street, Lafayette Street from West Washington to Commerce Street, and both Guarantee and Perry streets from West Washington to West Wythe Street.

In general, the district represents a typical nineteenth-century residential neighborhood with buildings dating from 1763 to 1928, including a cross section of housing types from grand mansions to workers' housing for mostly middle class residents. Architectural styles within the district include a broad range including Georgian, Federal, Italianate, Queen Anne, Neo-Classical Revival, and Colonial Revival. The majority of the houses in the district are of wood-frame construction; the remainder, consisting of brick or other masonry with a stucco finish, all front West Washington Street, the only major thoroughfare in the district. The district contains several double houses, both brick and frame. Unfortunately, some buildings are abandoned or are in extreme disrepair and several have experienced a terminal encounter with the bulldozer. Some of the lots have seen new construction; four of these newer buildings exist at present and unanimously receive the designation of noncontributing.

ARCHITECTURAL ANALYSIS

The Folly Castle Historic District had its origins in the late eighteenth century with the establishment of some rather significant houses on sizable plots of land. The first of these, Folly Castle, located at 323 West Washington Street, can best be described as a Georgian house that underwent alteration in the Italianate style in 1874. The gardens associated with this estate were quite large, extending north to Brick House Run and west to Lafayette Street. The wood-frame house, erected in 1763 by Peter Jones V, is two stories on a raised basement. The five-bay house features a hipped roof with paired interior end chimneys, beaded siding, and a modillion-block cornice. Originally Georgian in style, the house has seen the addition of a pair of round-arched windows to the second floor, bracketed window lintels, and an Italianate front porch with a projecting center bay, paired fluted Ionic columns, bracketed cornice, and turned balustrade. The interior is largely Italianate, with details dating from the 1874 renovation campaign. A fine cast-iron fence and gate defines the front yard, which was larger before 1855, when the house was moved a hundred feet south. The property today includes several outbuildings, some of which have been appended to the house, including a mid-nineteenth-century two-story brick kitchen.

Another significant late-eighteenth-century house that defines the district on the south side of West Washington Street is the Donnan House at 26 Perry Street, which was built around 1810 by Joel Hammond. This two-story wood-frame Georgian house with a raised basement is associated with the prominent Donnan family. The original front porch, which was nearly identical to the existing south porch, was enlarged around 1847 when the house was purchased by John Donnan, and remodeled in the Greek Revival style, featuring square columns, a denticulated entablature, and a simple balustrade. The first-floor windows also underwent modification; they were enlarged to floor-length. A Georgian dog-leg stair with molded rail, balusters, and newel is the most significant remaining original interior feature. Other interior detailing is largely in the Greek Revival style. The original two-story wood-frame kitchen exists today, detached from the main house, as a separate dwelling. Landscape features include a wood picket fence and linden trees along Perry Street planted by John Donnan from seedlings brought from Germany. The house remained in the Donnan family until the 1970s.

Strawberry Hill (individually listed on the National Register), located at 235 Hinton Street, is a handsome, two-story, wood-frame, Federal-style residence with a central pavilion situated between symmetrical wings to the east and west. The house was built around 1800; in 1816 the one-story side wings were altered by the addition of a second floor. The main entrance doorway and interior woodwork are original and exceptional examples of period craftsmanship. The house was severely altered around the turn of the century when it was converted into three residences. The wings were extended and the front entrance was moved one bay to the west. Over the past six years the house has undergone restoration to recreate its post-1816 symmetry. Originally, to the north and west of the house existed extensive gardens complete with granite walks and a spring.

The house directly north of the Donnan House, at 18 Perry Street, once the home and school of Jonathan Smith, is a two-and-a-half-story wood-frame residence constructed between 1790 and 1820. Originally located at the southwest corner of Perry and West Washington streets, it was moved to its present site in 1856 by Robert Dunn McIlwaine. With the relocation of this Federal-style house came the addition of an entrance porch on the east end. This porch, executed in the Greek Revival style, includes heavy square columns and a wide entablature. Another change made at the time of the move included the addition of a chimney on the north side of the house which eliminated two windows and displaced two others.

During the first half of the nineteenth century little new construction activity took place in the district. By the late 1850s, development was beginning to occur. An important pre-Civil War house in the district dates from 1858 and is an excellent example of the Italianate style. Known as the McIlwaine-Friend House, it was designed by the local architect B. J. Black. Located at 404 West Washington Street, this two-story brick with stucco house on a raised basement has an unusual front porch with a double-arched front opening ornamented with a massive pendant, paneled square columns, a bracketed cornice, and heavy iron cresting at the roof. The detailing of the house includes paired segmental- and round-arched windows with elaborate cast-iron hood molds, a heavy bracketed cornice, and iron balconies at the first-floor front windows. The original kitchen building to the south was appended to the main house around 1910 and functions as a rear wing. A fine cast-iron fence encloses the property; on the porch are two original cast-iron benches made by the Philadelphia firm of Wood and Perrot.

42 Perry Street is a simple, two-story, wood-frame, house located on the northwest corner of Perry and West Wythe (then Lawrence) streets; its earliest (north) section likely dates from around 1850; probably in the 1860s or 1870s the side-hall-plan house became more symmetrical with the addition of the southern section. The house was given Italianate flavor with a full-length one-story porch and projecting wooden window hoods on the second-floor windows.

Several houses were constructed by the 1850s, including the following along West Washington Street: 416, which is similar in construction to 42 Perry; and 523-525, 527, and 531-533. These last three, all contiguous, make up one of the most cohesive sections of the district on the north side of West Washington Street. The double house at 523-525 is a brick Greek Revival house with Eastlake/Italianate double porches. The house at 527 is a brick Greek Revival/Italianate dwelling with a full-length Greek Revival porch consisting of fluted Doric columns and a wide entablature. The double house at 531-533, a two-story wood-frame Italianate dwelling, has some of its original cast-iron fence and gates remaining. The house on the corner of West Washington and Lafayette streets is larger and more unusual than the other Italianate dwellings of the district with its massing and projecting bays.

Section number 7 Page 6

The remainder of the houses along West Washington Street date from the post-Civil War period and are mostly examples of the Italianate style. These houses contribute to the cohesive streetscape of uniform scale, materials, and setback. Some of the more stately homes at the east end of the street are noted for their fine architectural details and landscape features, particularly 303, 309, and 315 (designed by Harrison Waite, a local architect, and said to be the first house in the district to have electricity). These houses share common characteristics such as brick construction and patterned tile walks. Although 303 is Italianate in style like most of the others along West Washington Street, 309 and 315 are examples of the Queen Anne style, typified by asymmetrical massing, elaborate brickwork, and projecting polygonal bays. The properties at 303 and 309 also exhibit decorative cast-iron fences similar to the one surrounding Folly Castle. The Queen Anne style is also represented in the district by the house at 618 West Washington Street, a two-and-a-half-story, wood-frame residence with a clipped gable, oval attic window, and applied gable ornamentation. Much of the millwork used on the late-nineteenth-century houses in this area was produced by local mills; such inexpensive, mass-produced detailing allowed even middle-class owners of modest houses to keep up with the latest architectural styles.

The houses along Hinton Street all developed in the latter part of the nineteenth century as middle-class workers' homes. These houses, for the most part simple Italianate wood-frame structures, created a cohesive neighborhood street with common setbacks and two-story construction. Examples of Colonial Revival-style houses in the Folly Castle Historic District include 243-245 and 247 Hinton Street; 410, 430, 434, and 507 West Washington; and 22 Guarantee Street. The house at 410 West Washington Street, built in 1893 on property that was once part of the gardens of 404, displays especially fine wooden Adamesque detailing such as Palladian windows, a carved porch entablature, and slender Doric porch columns. The house at 430 West Washington Street, built around 1910, demonstrates in brick a more bold Colonial Revival interpretation. Noteworthy are the heavy modillioned cornices, jack arches with stone keystones, and fluted Ionic porch columns.

Two of the four non-residential buildings in the district are First Baptist Church and Second Presbyterian Church. First Baptist Church, located at 235 West Washington Street, was built in 1928 and exemplifies the Neo-Classical-Revival. It is a large brick church with a monumental portico with a full entablature and massive Doric columns. Second Presbyterian Church (listed individually on the National Register), located at 419 West Washington Street, on the corner of Lafayette and West Washington streets, is a Gothic Revival structure that dates from 1861. The building's exterior is stucco with brownstone hood molds and quoins around the front windows and buttresses along the sides. The education wings were added after 1915, and the central front tower recently has had the steeple replaced for the second time with a shorter and less prominent version of the original. The extraordinarily fine Gothic Revival interior featuring a U-shaped balcony, elaborate plaster ceiling medallion and cast-iron columns, remains intact. The tower of the church appears in the 1865 photograph showing West Washington Street looking east from what is now Hazel Street.

The now-abandoned Petersburg High School is another non-residential building in the district. Located at 512 West Washington Street, this imposing, symmetrical brick Neo-Classical Revival public building was built in 1917-1918. It occupies the site of the historic Anderson Academy. At the time it was built, the facility was considered among the most handsome public high schools in Virginia. It is constructed of yellow brick, with granite steps, Doric columns, and molded tile around the doors. The front facade features a projecting semicircular-plan auditorium with two-story engaged pilasters between ten-over-ten (second story) and fifteen-over-fifteen (first floor) windows. The paneled end pavilions are windowless on the front, and feature a denticulated modillion cornice and stepped parapets. To the rear of the building is a large, simple yellow-brick gymnasium addition.

One other non-residential building is a former store at 111 Lafayette Street. This building, built on a high brick basement right on the bank of Brick House Run, is a simple two-story wood-frame structure with a hipped metal roof. Built at the turn of the century, this store served local residents and workers at the nearby Seward Luggage Company.

There are four noncontributing structures in the district, all modern dwellings built since 1941. Three of them are houses and one is a modular unit moved from behind the Petersburg High School to serve as a church. The addresses are 315, 318, and 580 Hinton Street, and 503 Washington Street.

Unfortunately, a few buildings have been lost, including some with important historical associations. Probably the most significant loss has been that of the three-story, five-bay brick Greek Revival Dunlop House, once located at the southeast corner of Hinton and Davis streets. It was the home of David Dunlop, a prosperous tobacconist. Several tobacco factories, such as the one at the corner of Guarantee and West Washington streets (variously known as McEnery and McCulloch, Boykin Bland & Co., and C.A. Jackson Co. and visible in the 1865 photo of West Washington Street), provided a livelihood for many residents of the area, but are now only images in books and on maps. As mentioned earlier, the Petersburg High School building at 512 West Washington Street now occupies the former site of Anderson Academy, an impressive castellated masonry structure in the Gothic Revival style.

The district retains many of its period landscape features including iron and wood fences, tiled walks, brick walls, granite curbs, and shade trees such as the lindens along Perry Street.⁽¹⁾ The fence that surrounds the property where the Dunlop House once stood is the most outstanding example of cast-iron fence work in the district. The district is fortunate in retaining several original outbuildings, including storage buildings, kitchens, and small dwellings. These structures contribute to the sense of historic identity of the individual properties and the district as a whole, giving a sense of the historic appearance, functions, and site plans of the residential properties. Some remain as separate structures, while others have been appended to a main house.

An important natural feature in the district is the creek known as Brick House Run, which runs roughly north-south next to the High School and across Washington Street, after which it turns and runs east-west north of the houses in the four-hundred block of Hinton Street. The walls of the creek are lined with large pieces of Petersburg granite. On the north side of Washington Street, between what is now 537 and 541-543, once stood a house that actually spanned the creek; physical evidence of this house may still be seen in the walls of the creek at this point. The creek was frequently used in the eighteenth century as a land-ownership boundary; for example, Peter Jones V inherited his father's Petersburg land south and east of Brick House Run.(2)

The Folly Castle Historic District, with its cross-section of housing types and unified streetscapes, is a fine example of a nineteenth-century Petersburg neighborhood worth preserving for future generations.

ENDNOTES

1. The historic appearance of West Washington Street may be seen in a 1903 photograph in Art Work of Petersburg, Virginia (Chicago: The Gravure Illustration Company) which shows the street looking west from the corner of Perry Street. Many of the shade trees, fences and the streetcar lines running down the center of the street are now gone, but the buildings themselves remain largely unaltered from that period.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The Folly Castle District as expanded represents a middle- to upper-middle-class Petersburg residential neighborhood from the period 1763 to 1928. The area, centered on West Washington Street, is significant in local architecture for its cross-section of middle-class housing types, such as single-family residences and workers' double houses, and for its variety of architectural styles ranging from the Georgian to the Neo-Classical Revival. The district is also significant in local military history for the various roles several of its buildings served because of the Civil War; the McIlwaine-Friend House, for instance, was used as headquarters by Confederate Major General George E. Pickett from 1863 to 1864. The district was also linked with the development of industry and commerce in antebellum Petersburg and its rebirth after the Civil War. Although none of the area's industrial buildings have survived to the present, they influenced the development patterns of the area.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

The earliest feature of the Folly Castle Historic District is West Washington Street itself, which began as a road connecting the commercial center of burgeoning Petersburg with the rural areas to the west. The earliest house in the district is Folly Castle, built in 1763 by Peter Jones V, a descendant of the trader Peter Jones for whom Petersburg is named. The house's name is derived from its being a large house for the time (a "castle"), and built by an unmarried, childless man (a "folly"). The house originally stood approximately a hundred feet to the rear (north) of its current location; it was moved in 1855 to align it with its neighbors, all built long after Folly Castle. (1) Another early house is at 26 Perry Street, known as the Donnan House, dating from around 1810 and was built by Joel Hammond on land that had been owned by Peter Jones' niece and heir Jane Newsum and her husband Erasmus Gill. Strawberry Hill, on Hinton Street (then Friend Street), is an especially fine example of the Federal style built around 1800 probably by William Haxall, a prosperous flour miller who later moved to Richmond; it was owned subsequently by a succession of prominent Petersburg families. At the corner of West Washington and Perry streets was a smaller, less elaborate Federal-style house built between 1790 and 1820. In the early nineteenth century it was the home and school of Jonathan Smith. The house was moved in 1858 to its current location at 18 Perry Street, straight back from Washington Street so that its original front elevation became its north side.

The original owner of the land in this section of Petersburg was the Jones family. The year before he built Folly Castle, Peter Jones V laid off twenty-eight acres into lots and streets (of which no plat remains); this land, called New Town, was incorporated into the town limits at the same time. (2) Jones had inherited in 1758 a large portion of what is now central Petersburg and upon his death in 1779 he left his Petersburg property including Folly Castle to his niece, Sarah Newsum, who in 1786 married Erasmus Gill. The Gills shortly thereafter subdivided their very extensive land holdings into lots. The first houses in the area, therefore, were built at this time.

The period from 1820 to 1860 was, for Petersburg, a time of great prosperity and growth, and the development of the Folly Castle Historic District reflected this. The manufacturing base of Petersburg's economy developed in tandem with a boom in commerce, both of which were tied integrally to the growth of the railroads in this period. The city was the market and manufacturing center for most of the tobacco and cotton crops, as well as the iron ore produced in the southside Virginia and northern North Carolina area. On the eve of the Civil War, Petersburg was an important manufacturing, commercial, and transportation center, a very rare combination in the antebellum South. By 1860, Petersburg was the seventh largest city in the South, the second largest in Virginia, and trailed only Richmond in the value of its manufactured goods. (3)

The area west of Market Street and south of High Street had several important manufacturing concerns sprinkled through it. The district was characterized by, on the one hand, large factories and warehouses, sometimes occupying whole city blocks, and on the other, pleasant residential neighborhoods. It was not uncommon for a factory owner to make his home within a few blocks of his plant, or even within the yard of the factory. Many of the factories in the area were tobacco factories, which, because they did not depend upon water power, could be located anywhere within a reasonable distance of transportation. (4)

The prosperity of antebellum Petersburg encouraged the growth of the Folly Castle area although most of the residential development did not occur until close to 1860. At this time several important houses were built in the district, the most notable of which is 404 West Washington Street, the McIlwaine-Friend House, built in 1858. (It was at this time, in order to build this house, that the house which is now at 18 Perry Street was moved to the south from the corner.) This high-style Italianate house was built by Robert Dunn McIlwaine, who was in business with his illustrious father A. G. McIlwaine; the designer was B. J. Black, a local architect. (5) R.D. McIlwaine's daughter Hibernia married John Wesley Friend, of the prominent family of that name, and inherited the house. Their son Robert McIlwaine Friend was the father of the present owner. The grandeur of the house indicates at once the prosperity of the McIlwaine family and the fashionability of this area.

The Second Presbyterian Church on West Washington Street was also built in this period, and was finished in 1862. The design of the Gothic Revival church is attributed to Theodorick Pryor, pastor of the church at the time.

In 1847 John Donnan, of the cotton brokerage firm Donnan and Johnson, purchased 26 Perry Street. Donnan's prosperity is indicated by the renovations made to the house at this time, including the extension of the front porch and the lengthening of the windows in a Greek Revival manner.

The house at 422-424 West Washington Street is an unusually fine example of an Italianate double house. It was built around 1855 by Peter McEnery, one of the owners of McEnery and McCulloch Tobacco Company, probably as a speculative venture, since McEnery's own house was on Hinton Street.

The house at 541-543 West Washington Street, although a very simple house stylistically, is historically important as it figures prominently in an April, 1865 photograph of a Union wagon train heading west on Washington Street. (6) The house was built in the 1850s and appears from the photograph to have been a single-family house with a center front porch; it is now a double house with two end porches. Also visible in the photo is the tower of Second Presbyterian Church, the spire of the First Baptist Church which the present building replaced, and 527 West Washington Street, a brick Greek Revival house next to number 541-543. The streetscape has in fact changed remarkably little from that same view, although the tobacco factory visible on the south side of West Washington Street is now the site of several late-nineteenth-century houses.

The Civil War brought immense changes to this area, as well as to Petersburg as a whole. Many Petersburg families refugeeed to the surrounding counties; one of those that did was the Robert McIlwaines, whose house (404 West Washington) was used as headquarters by Confederate Major General George E. Pickett in 1863-1864, while he was commander of the Department of Virginia and North Carolina.(7) Subsequently, the house was lived in by Sarah Pryor (Mrs. Roger Pryor), whose book Remembrances of War and Peace describes her experiences as a refugee in Petersburg during the war.(8) During the ten-month period that Petersburg was under siege, the basement of the Donnan House was one of several bomb shelters created in the area for those who had not fled. The church yard of Second Presbyterian Church was used as a temporary Confederate burying ground, as Blandford Cemetery was too near the shelling. The tobacco factories in the area were commandeered for use as Confederate hospitals, since they were large and airy.

After the war, although the rebuilding of Petersburg's industrial and commercial enterprises was begun immediately, the city never recovered its former glory. Nevertheless, the post-war period was a time of real growth and development in the Folly Castle area. By far the majority of the buildings in the district date from this period. Most of the houses built between 1865 and 1900 were less grand and stood on smaller plots of land than the few that had been built previously. On the fringes of the area were built lower-middle-class houses, including several double houses. West Washington Street was the prime address in the area; it was along this busy street that the bank presidents, factory owners, commission merchants, and lawyers lived.(9) Hinton Street, which extended the one-block-long Friend Street, had been laid out in lots between 1867 and 1877 (Beers Map), but most of its development did not occur until the period 1880-1910. Guarantee Street was built up in the period 1890-1910, after the land on its east side, much of which had been part of the property of the Donnan House, was sold off; the street's inhabitants had such middle-class occupations as teacher, machinist, traveling salesman, and carpenter.

Several late-nineteenth-century buildings in the district are especially significant. The house at 308 West Washington, dating from around 1870, was the home in the 1870s of Drury A. Hinton, Commonwealth's Attorney. The successful grocer John O'Connor built the house at 315 West Washington in 1897. It was designed by local architect Harrison Waite, whose other work included several of the mansions on South Market Street (now lost) and many important public and commercial buildings such as the Odd Fellows Building on North Sycamore Street. This house, built on land bought from the Hinton estate, retains its Queen Anne/Eastlake interior detailing, including the original grained woodwork. It is reputed to have been the first house in Petersburg built with electric lighting, and the fixtures (with gas piping as a backup) also remain in the house.

In 1893, Robert Dunn McIlwaine deeded a portion of the gardens to the west of the McIlwaine-Friend House to his son of the same name. The younger McIlwaine, a doctor, built 410 West Washington Street as his home and office. The house is one of the best examples of the Colonial Revival style in Petersburg.

The largest building in the district, the Petersburg High School, was built 1917-18 on the site of the historic Anderson Academy (founded in 1821) on West Washington Street. The imposing classically-inspired structure exemplified the latest in educational design, accommodating nine hundred students and a variety of classrooms, laboratories, recreational facilities, and offices deemed necessary at the time. (10)

In 1928 the First Baptist Church, another Neo-Classical Revival building, was built on West Washington Street. This church stands near the site of two earlier churches that served this congregation. It was in fact built next to the existing building, which was demolished after the new church was constructed.

The arrival in the late 1880s of the streetcar (one line of which ran down Washington Street) brought great changes to the city of Petersburg. It opened lands on the very edges of the city to development as streetcar suburbs. As a result, the upper and middle classes, which had resided in the center of the city, moved to the new suburbs, while the lower classes, which had lived on the fringes of the urban area, moved toward the center. (12) The trend toward suburbanization, which most profoundly affected the Folly Castle area beginning in the years following World War II, together with the economic decline of Petersburg which began after the Civil War and escalated after the depression of the 1890s, meant that most center-city neighborhoods saw the halt of development in the early twentieth century.

The major change in the character of Petersburg has been widespread demolition since the 1960s. The Folly Castle Historic District has suffered relatively few residential losses or intrusions since the 1920s. Probably the most significant residential loss to the district was the demolition of the Dunlop House, owned by prominent tobacconist David Dunlop and used during the Civil War as the headquarters of General Sheridan. Another important change has been the removal of all of the industrial buildings that once helped define this district. Some of the lots thus emptied were subsequently built upon (the houses at 430, 434, 436-8 West Washington were built on the site of the McEney & McCulloch tobacco factory), while others have remained open land (such as the south side of the entire 500 block of Hinton Street, once the site of the J.P. Williamson Tobacco Stemmy in the late nineteenth century, then the lumber yard for Seward Trunk & Bag Co.).(12) The district today demonstrates a typical, but nonetheless significant, middle-class Petersburg neighborhood that illustrates the growth and change of the community in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries.

BOUNDARY JUSTIFICATION

The boundaries of the Folly Castle Historic District have been expanded to include the contiguous neighborhood which is consistent with the character of the existing district. Boundaries generally follow property lines, and exclude modern commercial buildings (east side of Perry Street), vacant land (east of First Baptist Church and Strawberry Hill), and modern institutional buildings (south, east and west of the High School). The northern boundary follows the property lines to the rear of the houses on Hinton Street, behind which the land slopes down to a creek bottom. West of 611 West Washington Street is a parking lot. The houses on the west side of Hazel Street are of modern construction, and so were not included.
