Summary Paragraph

The Confederate Monument stands at the corner of Court and High Streets at the town square. The monument is an obelisk of North Carolina granite just over 35 feet high and slightly less than four feet wide. It rests on a base 20 feet high and 15 feet square. At the four sides of the monument at right angles to it are four platforms upon which are four statues representing four branches of Confederate service: artillery, infantry, navy and cavalry. The entire monument sits in a small grassy park that is enclosed with a wrought iron fence. The monument stands in its original location and is in good condition.

Narrative Description

Portsmouth's Confederate Monument is located at the town square, corner of High and Court streets. Many Confederate monuments, like Portsmouth's, can be found in town squares or cemeteries.¹

In 1876 when construction on the monument began, the square represented the city's religious, civic, financial, and social life. At the square's southwest corner is Trinity Episcopal Church. At the northwest corner is the 1846 Courthouse. Today, both of these structures are on the National Register.

At the square's southeast corner, was the U.S. Post Office, now the site of the New Kirn Building and at the northeast corner was the Ocean House Hotel, now the site of the Tidewater Community College Visual Arts Center.

The monument, an obelisk of North Carolina granite ornamented at the cap, is 35 feet six inches high and 3 feet 9 inches wide. It rests on a base 20 feet high and 15 feet square, including four platforms at right angles to each face of the obelisk. From the ground, the entire monument's height is 56 feet, six inches.²

The base of the monument is made of quarry faced ashlar with a drafted margin. Above this square base rests a pedestal with composite molding at its base and four sides which slope upwards to another series of moldings and a course of egg and dart molding topped by triangular pediments on all four sides. From this rugged base and classically inspired pediment rises the simple shaft of the obelisk ornamented by a series of simple horizontal bands at its base, and the dates of the Civil War inscribed near the middle of its height. The obelisk is topped by a sort of capital with a small horizontal band, a device resembling

An obelisk with a square base, a pediment with projecting scallops and a five-pointed star within the pediment, and a small park. On the four sides, just below the pediment, are four bronze statues.

Atop each platform is a bronze statue representing the four branches of Confederate service: artillery (north elevation), infantry (south elevation), navy (east elevation) and cavalry (west elevation). The statues are five feet, nine inches tall, and stand at the "at rest" position.³

Facing south on the monument's pedestal is carved the inscription "To Our Confederate Dead" and around the four sides of the obelisk are inscribed the dates 1861, 1862, 1863, 1864 and 1865 which is directly below 1861 on the south facade. At the top of the monument also facing south, is a five-pointed star.⁴ In the ground facing north at the monument's base, rests a weathered marble stone honoring Major F. W. Jett, a Confederate engineer, who was influential in constructing the monument.⁵ To the left of the stone in the ground is a bronze plaque bearing the stone's inscription. Surrounding the entire monument is an ornamental iron railing with a gate on the north side. The entire monument sits on a small grassy park of approximately 545 square feet.

The monument is in good condition, stands in its original location, and has not been altered since its dedication, June 15, 1893.

The Confederate Monument includes three contributing objects: one sculpture one fence, add one commemorative stone. The bronze plaque is a non contributing object.

Summary Paragraph

Portsmouth's Confederate Monument follows the South's tradition of honoring its Civil War dead. From 1875 to 1893, the Monument Association and the Ladies Memorial Aid Association struggled to complete a monument to the Confederate dead of Portsmouth and Norfolk County. While their efforts parallel the efforts of other Southern communities, this monument is notable for the following reasons: First, the statues mounted on the four platforms surrounding the monument are not generic. In that the statues are unique and masterfully crafted the monument should qualify for its artistic merit. Secondly, the monument is one of three in the South containing a statue of a Confederate sailor. This commemoration of the Confederate sailor and his association with the Battle of Hampton Roads should qualify the monument under military history. Thus, despite the fact that the monument is a commemorative property, its design and symbolic value has invested it with its own historical significance.

Narrative Statement of Significance

Before 1860 there were few monuments erected in the United States other than grave markers. The close of the Civil War provided an opportunity that changed the situation.⁶ Soon, in the North, state governments and the Grand Army of the Republic began to raise monuments to its heroes in town squares and on battlefields. While in the South, including Portsmouth, Virginia, monuments rose more slowly in a defeated land and memorialized heroes of a lost cause.⁷ Also, unlike the North, southern monuments were usually raised by public subscription and by efforts of ladies memorial aid associations, later joined by monument associations, the United Confederate Veterans, the United Daughters of the Confederacy and the Sons of Confederate Veterans.⁸ In Portsmouth, efforts to erect a monument followed this pattern. The Ladies Memorial Aid Association led efforts to raise funds through picnics, fairs, and contests. They were later joined in their efforts by Stonewall Camp Number 380, United Confederate Veterans of Portsmouth, on April 9, 1884, nineteen years after Lee surrendered to Grant at Appomattox Court House, VA.⁹

The Ladies Memorial Aid Association of Portsmouth, VA, was founded on June 12, 1886, with one of its objectives being the erection of a monument to the Confederate dead of Portsmouth and Norfolk County.¹⁰ However, at war's end Portsmouth was $300,000 in debt,¹¹ and it wasn't until May 8, 1875, that progress began on a monument when the Portsmouth and Norfolk County Monument Association was formed at the suggestion of F. W. Jett, who had served with General William Mahone's Brigade.¹² Elected president of the association was James F. Crocker, adjutant of the Ninth Virginia Infantry, who had been wounded and captured during Pickett's Charge at Gettysburg.¹³

The association chose Charles E. Cassell, an ex-Confederate topographical engineer, to design the monument.¹⁴ Within the year he came up with an acceptable sketch, and on March 9, 1876, on the fourteenth anniversary of the Battle of Hampton Roads, a committee from the monument association approached Portsmouth City Council with a petition requesting the monument be built at the present site and Council approved.¹⁵ Whether or not the committee chose the date on purpose is open to conjecture; however, the timing could not have been better.

Fundraising continued through public subscription and through social affairs organized by the Ladies Memorial Aid Association.¹⁶ Much of the financial burden was lifted, however, when the Seaboard and Roanoke and the Raleigh and Gaston railroad companies donated granite from their quarries near Henderson, N.C.¹⁷ Frank Tynan, a stonecutter and veteran of the Third Virginia Infantry, surveyed the job and traveled to the quarries to cut the stone.¹⁸

On December 14, 1876, the cornerstone was laid with Masonic ceremonies. Placed within the cornerstone were the following: a photograph of the late Colonel James G. Hodges, commander of the Fourteenth Virginia Infantry; a Confederate account of the Battle of Gettysburg; a Confederate flag, bonds, currency and postage stamps; a payroll of a Confederate company; list of officers and men of Grimes' Battery (Portsmouth Light Artillery); a fire marshal's baton used in the Centennial Parade in Philadelphia; masonic documents and articles; daily papers of Norfolk and Portsmouth; and silver currency of various nationalities.¹⁹

Almost five years would pass before the capstone was placed on June 15, 1881.²⁰ The ornamental iron fence was placed around the monument in 1882.²¹ On December 15, 1887, the infantry (south elevation) and artillery (north elevation) statues were received from the Monumental Bronze Company²² of Connecticut²³ and were placed on their platforms. The remaining statues, navy

(east elevation) and cavalry (west elevation), were placed subsequent to the dedication of the monument.²⁴ The effort to complete the monument was finished on June 15, 1893, after almost 18 years and $9,236.24 in expenditures.²⁵

During the Civil War, Portsmouth gave 1,242 men to the Confederacy of whom 199 were killed or died; Norfolk County gave 1,018 men to the cause of whom 280 were killed or died; and the City of Norfolk gave 1,119 of whom 176 were killed or died.²⁶ Shortly after the war, Portsmouth and Norfolk County residents desired to erect a monument to her Confederate dead. While the story of Portsmouth's monument parallels the story of other Confederate monuments, it differs in several respects.

Unlike most Confederate monuments containing statues, the figures on Portsmouth's monument are not generic. Following the cornerstone laying, four local men were chosen to pose for the figures. Photographs were taken at the Davis Studio at 316 High Street, Portsmouth and were used by the Monumental Bronze Company to create the statues.²⁷

To raise money to erect the statues, the Monument Association held a contest. Placed in the window of R. G. Hume and Bro. on High Street from November, 1883, to April, 1884, were four sets of pictures intended as possible designs from which to select the style of the statues.

Three sets were furnished by A. M. Turner and represented the four branches of Confederate Service: infantry, artillery, cavalry and the navy. The sets were in dress uniforms, in fighting uniforms and in overcoats. James F. Carr of Portsmouth furnished the fourth set depicting the jacket uniformed Confederate as he appeared in the field. These were finished in India Ink. A valuable heavily gold mounted and richly chased cane made from wood of the CSS Virginia was exhibited beside the pictures as a prize to the winning artist.

Four boxes were placed at Hume's and for 10 cents a vote the public decided the character of the statues.²⁸ Turner was the winner.²⁹

These men have been identified as models: J. Shirley Hope posed as the artilleryman and Frank Wonycott posed as the cavalryman. William Henry Buchanan,³⁰ a veteran of Grimes Battery and a grand-nephew of President James Buchanan who was wounded at the Battle of Brandy Station, posed for one of the remaining statues. James W. Nicholson honored his kinsman who was killed at the Battle of Shiloh by posing for the last statue.³¹ Since Shiloh was a major land battle in the War's Western Theater of Operation, it may be that Nicholson modeled for the infantryman. Buchanan, then, may be the model for the sailor. A man named Allen has also been mentioned as a model, but there is no further information about this individual.³²

The sailor's statue is particularly significant. It is one of three statues in the South honoring the Confederate sailor.³³ The statue faces east toward the Elizabeth River, the route taken by the CSS Virginia in her engagement with the USS Monitor on March 8-9, 1862, during the Battle of Hampton Roads. This engagement marked the first time metal ships met in combat and the end of the age of wooden war ships.

Along the headband of the sailor's flat hat can be read the word "Merrimac." When the U.S. Navy abandoned the Gosport Navy Yard on April 20, 1861, Commodore Charles S. Some histories report that among salvageable items were naval uniforms and hats that later worn by the CSS Virginia's Crew.³⁴

Verbal Boundary Description

The Confederate Monument stands on grassy park surrounded by an ornamental fence, which serves as a boundary. The site is approximately 545 square feet. It is located in Court Street at the corner of Court and High Streets. The property is 17 feet from the western limit of Court Street, 18 feet 19 inches from the eastern limit of Court Street and 54 feet 2 inches from its intersection with High Street.

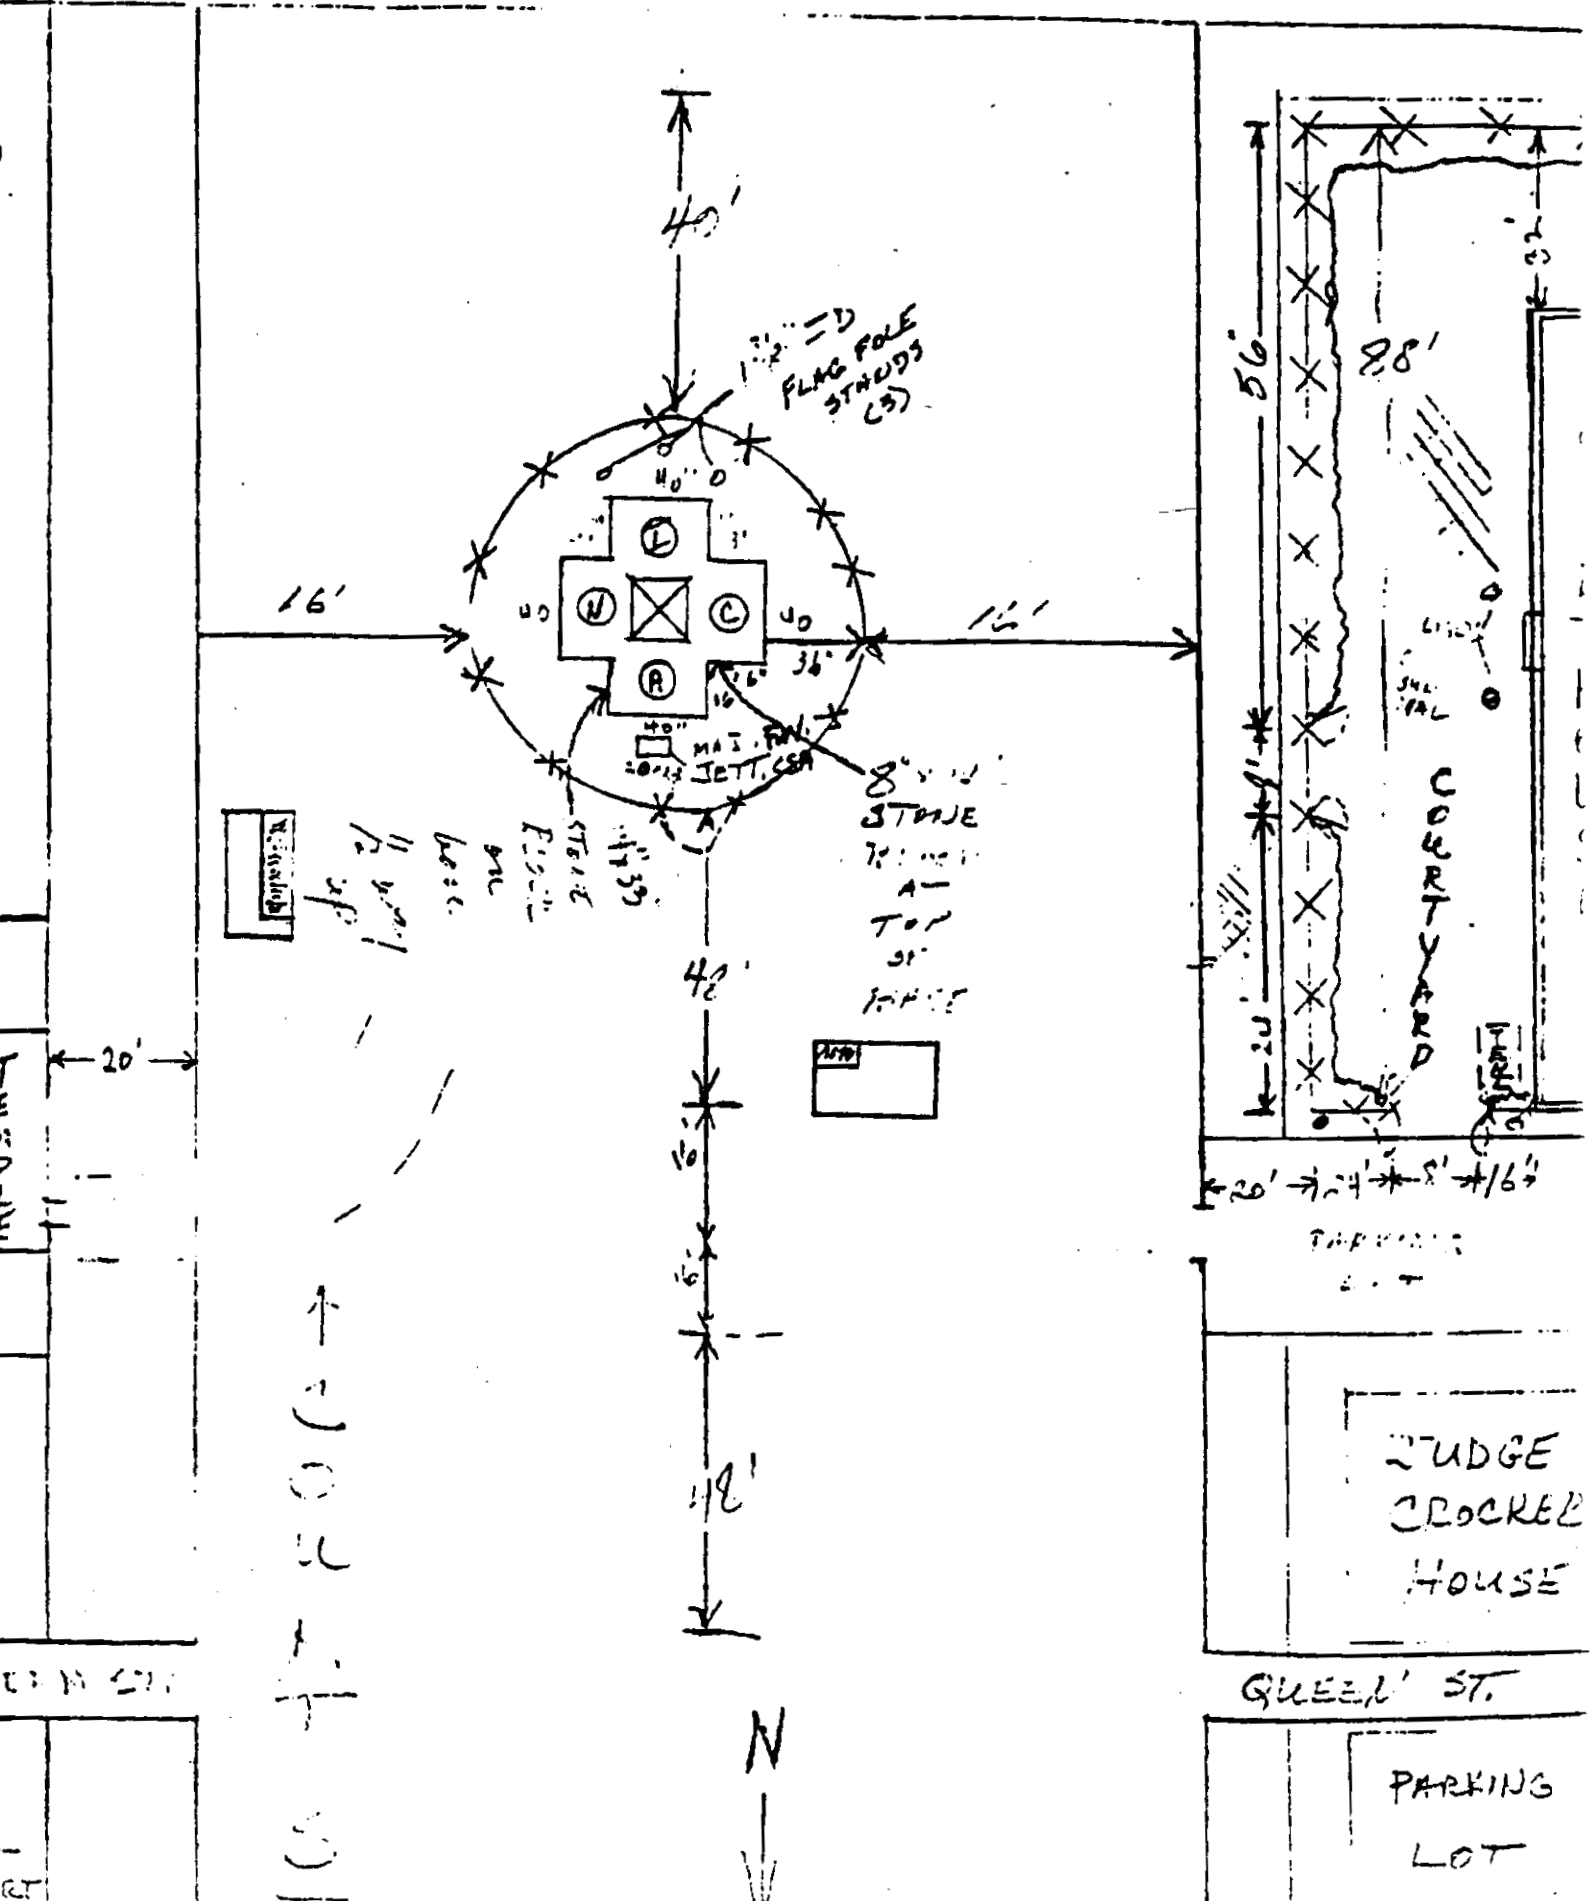

Boundary Justification

On March 9, 1876, a committee from the Portsmouth and Norfolk County Association approached Portsmouth City Council requesting the High and Court Street intersection as a location for the monument and council approved. This site, as described above is and has always been the extent of the physical boundary of the monument.

The nominated property includes the entire parcel historically associated with the monument.
