SUMMARY DESCRIPTION

Located approximately three miles from Washington, D.C., Penrose is a cohesive residential neighborhood located in central Arlington County, Virginia. The community, surrounded by modern residential and commercial development, is physically bounded by the major automobile thoroughfares of Arlington Boulevard to the north and Columbia Pike to the south. Other boundaries include South Wise Street and South Courthouse Road on the east, and South Fillmore Street and South Barton Street on the west. The neighborhood was created with the integration of twelve distinct subdivisions platted between 1882 and 1943. Sited on a rural tract originally adjacent to the Arlington House property, the neighborhood was initially improved with modest single-family residences. Known collectively as Penrose, the neighborhood includes buildings that display architectural elements reflecting the neighborhood's entire period of development, with additional infill construction added during the latter part of the 20th century. The domestic buildings, constructed of both wood frame and masonry, are primarily set back from the road with wide sidewalks buffering them from the paved public roadways. Many properties incorporate driveways and freestanding garages. The residential lots vary in size, with the standard lot measuring approximately fifty feet by 100 feet. The streets run in a slightly irregular grid pattern between Arlington Boulevard, Columbia Pike, South Fillmore Street, and South Courthouse Road. Because the neighborhood developed over time through an amalgamation of different subdivisions, there are slight variations in the streetscapes and lot configurations. Mature shade trees and decorative lighting fixtures line many of the streets. A landscaped median defines the wide avenue of Sixth Street South. Penrose, while primarily a single-family residential neighborhood, is also home to a number of multiple dwellings, a church, commercial development along Columbia Pike, and two landscaped parks, including Penrose Park and Butler-Holmes Park, named after the neighborhood's founders.

Originally a rural farming community, the initial development in the area that became Penrose consisted of roughly thirty-two subdivided parcels by 1900 in the Butler-Holmes section, as documented by historic maps. Of the original dwellings constructed on these lots, approximately twenty-five remain standing today. An additional eleven dwellings in the neighborhood date between 1901 and 1914. The modest dwellings, located primarily in the northern Butler-Holmes Subdivision and along Columbia Pike, were not originally part of a planned residential community. The slow development on small land tracts, primarily less than ten acres in size, was accelerated, however, as World Wars I and II began an unprecedented need for housing surrounding the nation's capital. This created a second phase of suburban development, spurred by the influx of middle-class residents, with over 400 buildings constructed between 1915 and 1954. Today, Penrose is defined by a variety of architectural styles and building types, although primarily domestic in nature. The houses range from the late-19th and early-20th-century vernacular, Queen Anne, Italianate, and Colonial Revival farm dwellings to the infill housing of the late 20th and early 21st centuries. The early-to-mid-20th-century buildings often exhibit vernacular, less detailed interpretations of the fashionable styles becoming popular throughout the nation, while the later more modest development reflects the solid middle-class nature of the commuter suburb. The dominant forms and styles, albeit often vernacular, include modest interpretations of the Queen Anne, Italianate, Bungalow/Craftsman, Colonial Revival, Dutch Colonial Revival, Tudor Revival, Moderne, the Cape Cod, and the American Foursquare. A notable number of these dwellings are prefabricated kit or mail-order houses. Although a number of these dwellings have altered materials or small additions, the overall integrity of the neighborhood remains intact. The area making up the present Penrose neighborhood consists of 520 properties, the majority single dwellings supported by multiple dwellings, a church, and two parks that have remained a centerpiece of the neighborhood, visually as well as socially. Additionally there are 217 outbuildings, including sheds, garages, carports, picnic pavilion, playgrounds, barbecue pits, basketball courts, swimming pools, and playhouses. There are 474 contributing resources and 262 non-contributing resources.

DETAILED DESCRIPTION

Early development in Penrose (1882-1914)

Prior to the turn of the 20th century, Arlington County remained characterized by its distinctly rural nature. Early maps of Arlington, which was part of Alexandria County until 1920, show the central Arlington area sparsely developed with small, randomly laid-out farms located within open tracts of forest, farmland, and orchards. By the turn of the 20th century, when suburban development was widespread throughout the county, many of the original farmhouses were demolished, the land tracts surveyed, and suburban plans created. Conceived as a middle-class residential community for African Americans displaced by the disbanding of the Freedman's Village on the nearby Arlington estate, Penrose was originally founded by William H. Butler and Henry Louis Holmes, local African American leaders. Although the neighborhood was slow to develop, once the original plat was laid-out in 1882, a handful of vernacular single-family dwellings were constructed

The new community, known as the Butler-Holmes subdivision, was composed of an irregular grid plan with long, narrow blocks oriented on an east-west axis, with South Fillmore Street (originally Spruce Street) serving as the main transportation artery. During this initial development, architectural styles reflected the fashionable trends popular throughout the nation. Many of the early dwellings constructed in the Butler-Holmes subdivision feature unadorned interpretations of the elements and forms associated with the Queen Anne, Colonial Revival, and Italianate styles. Butler-Holmes was soon expanded with the platting of P.P. Lewis' Addition to Arlington Heights in 1890 and McGowan and Lewis' Addition to Arlington Heights in 1890. Historic maps reveal that approximately seventy-eight dwellings were erected in Penrose by 1900. According to the architectural survey, approximately twenty-five primary resources dating to 1900 or earlier remain in the neighborhood. Although the majority of the dwellings are strongly vernacular, a number exhibit vague references, primarily in form, to the fashionable architecture styles sweeping the nation, including Queen Anne (4), Italianate (1), and Colonial Revival (2) dwellings. Other dwellings also exhibit early examples of the emerging Bungalow/Craftsman form. A handful of the properties have freestanding garages and sheds associated with them that, although often historic, were constructed at a later date.

Early examples of building types in Penrose include the late-19th-century vernacular dwellings that dominated the neighborhood during its early more rural years. Significant examples of this type include the circa 1880 home of William Butler at 2407 2nd Street South (000-8823-0093) and the circa 1890 house at 2505 1st Street South (000-8823-0072), once belonging to Dr. Charles Drew. The Drew House, a National Historic Landmark also listed on the National Register of Historic Places, remains in the Drew family. Similarly, the William Butler House continues to be owned by descendants of William Butler. The Butler House and the Drew House are both wood-framed, two-story dwellings clad in weatherboard with overhanging eaves, full-width front porches with turned-post supports, and double-hung sash windows with square-edged wood surrounds. The Butler House features a wrap-around porch and exposed porch rafters, while the Drew House features a boxed wood cornice with returns and a shed porch. The wood-frame dwellings at 22 South Fillmore Street (000-8823-0080) and 2321 and 2317 2nd Street South (000-8823-0092 and 000-8823-0091), among others, are also significant examples of the vernacular buildings constructed in the early years of Penrose's history. The dwelling at 22 South Fillmore Street, constructed circa 1900, is a vernacular wood-frame dwelling that features a multiple-gable roof with concrete tiles, asbestos shingle cladding, and a solid foundation. Standing two stories in height, the dwelling features overhanging eaves, a side-elevation inset entry, paired windows, overhanging eaves, and a one-story rear shed addition. Details include a boxed wood cornice, square aluminum surrounds and sills, a tripartite window, and a single-leaf entry with one-light transom.

Queen Anne was a building style also exhibited in the early development of Penrose. Among the attractions generating considerable interest at the 1876 Centennial in Philadelphia were several English buildings designed in the Queen Anne style, which would prove to be widely influential in America from the 1870s until just after the turn of the 20th century. The style dismissed the impractical Gothic style by emphasizing human scale and domestic comforts. In America, the style found an exuberant expression in wood, and frequently incorporated classical columns and decorative motifs borrowed from our own colonial architecture. Thus, like the Colonial Revival dwellings, the majority of the Queen Anne houses in Penrose were originally constructed on brick foundations with wood-frame structural systems clad with shingles or weatherboard. Presently clad in a variety of materials, the roofs historically consisted of a number of intricate pitches that rose from the main hip or gable. The forms of the dwellings were typically accentuated by corner towers, porches, and bay windows, accented with columns, balustrades, and patterned shingles. Queen Anne-inspired houses in Penrose can be seen at 419 South Adams Street (000-8823-0141) and 401 South Edgewood Street (000-8823-0198), among others. The house at 401 South Edgewood Street has a steeply-pitched hipped roof with a front-gable extension on the facade. The resulting footprint has a truncated L shape. The dwelling features a Queen Anne-inspired form with decorative vergeboard in the gable peak and turned porch posts with decorative spindlework brackets. The asymmetrical facade is two bays wide with a side-passage entrance

The Italianate style, prevalent from the late 1870s to the 1920s, was popularized in England during the Picturesque movement. Identifying features include bracketed cornices, elongated arched windows, bracketed porch supports, molded window hoods, shallow-pitched roofs, beltcourses, and decorative window surrounds. The dwelling at 2415 1st Street South (000-8823-0031) stands as one of the few Italianate-style dwellings in Penrose, and one of three extant masonry dwellings from the late 19th century in Arlington County. Constructed circa 1880 the brick, two-story brick building features a rectangular block, elongated window openings, a segmental-arched transom, and wide stone arches and sills. This modestly adorned dwelling does not incorporate the stylistic detailing often associated with the style such as decorative brackets, but instead draws from the form with modest vernacular detailing.

Another early vernacular building in the neighborhood is the Hunter Station/Finklestein Store at 2312 2nd Street South (000-8823-0505). Constructed circa 1900, the station served the Washington-Virginia Company's streetcar line, which extended from Rosslyn to Nauck, and later functioned as a small store. The wood-frame building's footprint conforms to the path of the streetcar rails that ran diagonally from northeast to northwest. With the increased use of the automobile and the demise of the streetcar line, the building was rehabilitated for use as a store and delicatessen. Largely devoid of applied ornament, the building was rehabilitated a second time as a single-family dwelling.

Subsequent Development in Penrose (1915-1954)

Construction in Penrose, as in other suburban Arlington communities, picked up in the second and third decades of the 20th century. Beginning with the influx of workers to the Washington, D.C. region during the First World War (1914-1918) the pace of development throughout Arlington was greatly heightened, continuing into the 1940s. From 1915 to 1941, the population of Arlington County increased dramatically, with 16,040 residents listed in the census in 1920 and 57,040 by 1940.¹ Well over 300 buildings were erected between 1915 and 1945, compared to the approximately forty-six built prior to 1915. Respecting the architectural heritage of the planned community, the level of craftsmanship of the building construction remained high.

Following on the heels of America's Centennial celebrations in 1876, the Colonial Revival style emerged in the early 1880s. The style, which borrowed heavily from early American architecture—particularly the Georgian and Federal styles—was largely an outgrowth of a new nationwide pride in the past and a rapidly growing interest in historic preservation. In the early phase, the Colonial Revival style remained the exclusive domain of fashionable architecture firms and was favored for the large residences of wealthy clients. In general, as the style spread to the suburbs and increased in popularity, the detailing and form became increasingly more modest. The stylistic expression presented during the development of the Penrose neighborhood epitomizes the suburban expression of the Colonial Revival, with many examples of the style constructed during the second and third quarters of the 20th century.

Domestic architectural trends of this period soon shifted from the Colonial Revival to the Craftsman/Bungalow style and form. The bungalow form was typically covered by a low-pitched, intersecting gable roof that often encompassed a wrap-around porch and featured stylistic Craftsman details including exposed rafters, overhanging eaves, and battered posts. The one- to one-and-a-half-story bungalow, which earlier had mimicked the architectural ornament of the late Victorian period, later displayed the fashionable Craftsman style. Magazines led the way in introducing affordable housing to the new mobile consumers. As the popularity of the form was heightened during the second quarter of the 20th century, the bungalow form of Arlington County was equally embellished with Queen Anne- and Colonial Revival-style detailing. Throughout the United States, a notable number of these types of dwellings, including both bungalows and foursquares, were prefabricated kit or mail-order houses from companies including Sears, Roebuck and Company, Aladdin Homes, the Hodgson Company, Montgomery Ward, and the Ray H. Bennett Lumber Company, among others. The kit houses were often purchased by a builder, who copied the plans when constructing other dwellings of the same design. As a result, it is often difficult to determine from the exterior which dwellings are actual kit houses or copied designs. Although no research revealed specific examples in Penrose, the widespread popularity and use of kit houses suggests that at least a few were constructed in the neighborhood.

A representative example of the Craftsman/Bungalow is illustrated by the dwelling at 2803 2nd Street South (000-8823-0082), the second home of Dr. Henry Louis Holmes, which was erected circa 1918. Displaying stylistic elements typical of the style, this dwelling features a rock-faced concrete block foundation, overhanging eaves, concrete block porch posts, overhanging eaves, a full-width one-story front porch, and paired 2/2 and six-light casement windows. The bungalow dwelling at 308 South Cleveland Street (000-8823-0217) features a central gabled wall dormer, wood-shingle cladding, and exposed rafters, while the bungalow at 802 South Barton Street (000-8823-0384) features banked windows, exposed rafters, and a central eyebrow dormer. Another example is located at 824 South Barton Street (000-8823-0446). The dwelling features wood-frame construction, weatherboard cladding, an inset full-width porch with battered posts on brick piers, a central gabled dormer, square-edged wood surrounds, overhanging eaves, and exposed rafters. Similarly, the bungalow at 631 South Adams Street (000-8823-0433) is representative of the form. Set on a rock-faced concrete block foundation, the one-and-a-half-story wood-frame dwelling, which was erected circa 1925, features a gabled porch with battered posts and a wood-shingled peak, a multi-light single-leaf entry, wood-frame construction, overhanging eaves, a wood cornice with brackets, and square-edged wood surrounds.

Augmenting the bungalow is the American Foursquare form, which was commonly ornamented with Colonial Revival and Craftsman-style detailing. The two-story, four-room-per-floor plan without a hall was popular throughout the nation and provided the working and middle classes with a larger, more stylish dwelling. Consequently, the form was cheaper to construct and answered an egalitarian society's demand for simple building materials and forms. Additionally, the foursquare displayed materials that ranged from weatherboards, shingles, or brick veneer to solid brick, cast-cement block, or poured concrete. One example of the several American foursquares constructed in the early part of the 20th century in Penrose is the house at 721 South Wayne Street (000-8823-0468). This freestanding dwelling was constructed circa 1920 and has the characteristically distinguished two-story height, hipped or pyramidal roof, and a large full-width front porch. The overall shape is cubical with the main entry located off-center. Minimally detailed, the building lacks any specific reference to stylistic trends and represents the many affordable dwellings constructed throughout Penrose.

During the second and third quarters of the 20th century in Penrose, the Colonial Revival experienced a widespread resurgence in popularity. However, house sizes and stylistic features began to change with the construction of significant numbers of smaller and even more modest single, twin, and multiple dwellings. A rise in residential construction between 1940 and 1945 in Penrose prompted the construction of numerous brick Colonial Revival-style buildings on the neighborhood's remaining unimproved lots. The Colonial Revival style, one of the most popular architectural styles in Penrose, was adapted to meet the housing needs of many suburban neighborhoods in Arlington County in the middle part of the 20th century. Consequently, the larger high-style dwellings were reduced to three-bay-wide rectangular structures, often with projecting porticos, cornice returns, open pediments, and Tuscan columns. Numerous examples of buildings in Penrose demonstrate this shift to slightly smaller Colonial Revival-style dwellings. The circa 1940 two-story dwelling at 2501 2nd Street South (000-8823-0097) in Penrose is an excellent example. The brick dwelling has an off-center entry with Colonial Revival surround featuring fluted pilasters, a dentil course, and a closed pediment. This structure has a side-gable roof and a brick soldier course beneath the wood cornice. The 6/6 and 8/8 double-hung sash windows have brick rowlock sills and soldier-coursed lintels. Other Colonial Revival dwellings include the buildings at 824 and 832 South Courthouse Road (000-8823-0370 and 000-8823-0371). The dwelling at 824 South Courthouse Road stands as one of the most high-style examples of the Colonial Revival style in Penrose. Measuring three bays in width with recessed one-story flat-roofed wings, the dwelling stands two stories in height. Set on a solid foundation, the masonry dwelling features a hipped roof, a central entry with segmental-arched pediment, dentils, and fluted pilasters. Other detailing includes jack arch lintels with concrete keystones, a dentiled wood cornice, a rowlock beltcourse, paneled first-story window spandrels, and exterior-end brick chimneys.

Similarly, the one-and-a-half-story Cape Cod cottages of the 1930s and 1940s exhibit the familiar detailing and form commonly associated with the Colonial Revival style. The Cape Cod was also a popular choice for modest Colonial Revival-style building construction. The form generally presents a one-and-a-half-story symmetrical facade with gabled dormers and a central entry, often with a Colonial Revival door surround, entablature, and pilasters. This form provided an adequate and affordable housing mode for the growing population of working- and middle-class residents of Arlington County, while mimicking the fashionable style of the period. Identified numerous times throughout the survey area, the Cape Cod buildings are typically constructed of brick with side-gable roofs and front-gable dormers. The examples identified in Penrose are typically three bays wide, two bays deep, and have a central-passage plan. Detailing of these Cape Cod dwellings often includes the typical Colonial Revival door surround with Tuscan pilasters supporting a molded entablature or pediment, Tuscan porch posts, and 6/6 double-hung windows with brick rowlock sills. Representative of the mid-20th century Cape Cod form, the dwelling at 721 Veitch Street South (000-8823-0502), constructed circa 1940, stands one-and-a-half stories in height with a pair of gabled dormers with 6/6 windows. Constructed of stretcher-bond brick, the dwelling is dominated by a central entry with Colonial Revival surround featuring a molded entablature and fluted Tuscan pilasters. Other details on the symmetrically fenestrated Cape Cod include an exterior-end chimney, rowlock sills, a wood cornice, side-elevation soldier brick lintels, square wood surrounds, and vertical-board wood shutters with a diamond motif. Another illustrative example includes the dwelling at 2810 5th Street South (000-8823-0256). The dwelling, constructed circa 1930, features a side-gabled roof with two gabled dormers, American-bond brick construction, and an inset screened porch sheltering the single-leaf entry. Other details include an exterior-end brick chimney, rowlock sills, a wood cornice, soldier brick lintels, square-edged wood surrounds, paneled wood shutters, and a rear shed dormer.

The mid-20th century, with its suburban explosion of the Colonial Revival style, also sparked other similar forms. Penrose features two classic examples of the Dutch Colonial Revival style, also popularized in America during the early 20th century. Each of these buildings stands one-and-a-half stories in height and features a gambrel roof and Colonial Revival detailing, elements typical of the style. The dwelling at 812 South Adams Street (000-8823-0414), constructed circa 1945, measures three bays in width and stands one-and-a-half stories in height. Capped by a gambrel roof with asphalt shingles, the single dwelling displays a central entry with a Colonial Revival-style surround featuring a molded entablature and Tuscan fluted pilasters. Other details include flared eaves, a stone veneer, projecting three-sided bays, and symmetrical fenestration with three gabled dormers. The style is also visible at 717 South Veitch Street (000-8823-0501). Constructed circa 1940, the stretcher-bond brick dwelling features an asymmetrical façade with a gambrel asphalt-shingle roof. Stylistic embellishments include a boxed wood cornice, an off-center entry with a dentiled entablature and Tuscan pilasters, casement and octagonal wood windows, and wood vertical-board shutters.

Similarly, the Tudor Revival style, derived from 16th-century Elizabethan and Jacobean England, was adapted and became popular in the United States for mid-20th-century suburban construction. Modest, minimally influenced examples of the style are featured in Penrose. Character-defining features of the style that are displayed in these dwellings often include a steeply pitched front-gable roof, a front-elevation exterior chimney, flared eaves, and half-timbering. Three modest examples of the style are found in Penrose, including the dwelling at 719 South Adams Street (000-8823-0427). Measuring three bays in width, the one-and-a-half-story brick dwelling is dominated by a central entry vestibule with an off-center steeply pitched roof with flared eaves. Rowlock sills, a recessed wood-frame one-story wing, an arched single-leaf entry door with rowlock segmental-arched lintel, and paired 6/6 wood windows further define the dwelling. The other two examples include the dwellings at 612 South Adams Street (000-8823-0401) and 310 South Edgewood Street (000-8823-0200). The circa 1940 dwelling at 401 South Adams Street features an off-center projecting gable and an entry vestibule with flared eaves. More modestly designed, the brick dwelling at 310 South Edgewood Street features a dominant off-center front gable and an exterior-front shouldered brick chimney with randomly laid stone veneer detailing.

Spurred by the need to house numerous government workers during wartime, Arlington saw the mass introduction of the multi-family dwelling and the apartment building. This new housing type was quickly embraced throughout the region. A handful of historic multiple dwellings, primarily composed of twin dwellings and apartments, exist in the neighborhood. Each of these dwellings presents a style and scale in keeping with the existing single-family dwellings in the neighborhood.

Multiple dwellings also comprise part of the domestic housing stock in Penrose, particularly along the neighborhood's perimeter. These multiple dwellings include twin dwellings that display references to the Colonial Revival style as frequently seen in the contemporaneous single-family dwellings that were constructed during the middle of the 20th century. Twin dwellings are present primarily along the 100 and 200 blocks of South Veitch and South Wayne Streets and along the 200 and 300 blocks of South Courthouse Road. The similar styles and proximity of the dwellings suggest that a single developer may have constructed them. The twin dwellings, constructed circa 1940, feature Colonial Revival entrance surrounds with pilasters, entablatures, and pediments. Examples of the numerous twin dwellings in the neighborhood include 300-302 South Veitch Street (000-8823-0301), 517-519 South Veitch Street (000-8823-0305), and 405-407 South Veitch Street (000-8823-0312). Typical of the building type, the Colonial Revival-style twin dwelling at 405-407 South Veitch Street measures four bays in width and stands two stories in height. The dwelling is set on a solid brick foundation and features masonry construction with six-course American-bond brick, a side-gabled roof with asphalt shingles, and a central-interior chimney. A single-leaf entry and two double-hung windows pierce each dwelling. Detailing includes Colonial Revival door surrounds with pediments and fluted pilasters, decorative brick detailing, rowlock sills, and a wood cornice. The dwelling at 300-302 South Veitch Street is also representative of a type of twin dwelling that was constructed in Penrose with stylistic detailing not as pronounced. The masonry dwelling stands two stories in height and measures four bays in width. A shed porch shelters each single-leaf entry. The detailing is limited to a molded wood cornice and rowlock sills.

Reflecting the initial influence of the automobile, many of the dwellings within Penrose have freestanding garages. These structures are typically built of wood frame, often matching the cladding of the primary dwelling, and are capped with gable roofs. A number of the properties also have sheds and carports, although many are non-historic, dating to the last quarter of the 20th century.

Development After 1954

Since 1954, approximately eighty-five primary resources have been constructed in Penrose, primarily as infill housing primarily built on unimproved lots laid out in the original plats. Consequently, there was no subdivision of existing lots, and the layout remained consistent with the original design intentions of the land developers. In general, the massing, material, and scale of the modern buildings is consistent with that of their historic neighbors, creating a cohesive residential neighborhood reflective of building trends from the turn of the 20th century to the present.

Most of the infill construction consisted of small, one-story dwellings with a minimum of detail. Showing the increased influence of the automobile, another trend exhibited in these minimal traditional dwellings is the attached garage, which began to show up in the neighborhood after 1940. These attached garages are set either in side wings or as part of the façade of the dwelling and have roll-up garage doors. An example can be seen at the dwelling at 728 South Wayne Street (000-8823-0464), constructed circa 1940. The one-bay-wide garage is located in a one-and-a-half-story gabled wing. A soldier brick lintel and thin molded wood surround mark the roll-up wood door. A number of non-historic infill dwellings also exhibit the attached garage.

The early-20th-century fondness for horizontality, reflected in the bungalow, found expression later in the century with the ranch form. Also, the two-story Colonial Revival was reduced to even more modest examples. Common idioms included the illusion of masonry construction by the application of brick veneer and textured vinyl siding to mimic wood weatherboard. Craftsman and Colonial Revival elements are commonly displayed, however, the interpretations are typically more vernacular than previous examples. Stylistically, the most modern infill housing, dating to the late 20th century, generally respects the established architectural heritage of the community by adopting traditional features, although often with synthetic materials such as vinyl. The modern building trends often incorporated stylistic forms and detailing, particularly influenced by the Victorian and Colonial Revival periods. This is evident at 514 South Barton Street (000-8823-0172) and 390 South Barton Street (000-8823-0176). Details on the dwellings include overhanging eaves, boxed cornices with returns, gabled porticos, fanlight transoms, patterned shingles, and projecting gables. Similarly, the dwelling at 407 South Edgewood Street (000-8823-0196) is illustrative of this contemporary building type. Mimicking the Queen Anne form, the two-story, wood-frame dwelling features an off-center projecting gable with two-story canted bay windows, a wrap-around porch with turned wood balusters, and overhanging eaves with a boxed cornice. Vinyl siding, vinyl windows, an aluminum cornice, and vinyl louvered shutters differentiate this dwelling from its historic counterparts.

Trinity Episcopal Church (000-8823-0480) at 2217 Columbia Pike represents high-style Colonial Revival construction in Penrose. The five-course Flemish-bond brick church, constructed in 1957, is two bays wide with a front-gabled main block and a one-story gabled entry wing. The main block features a central Palladian window with molded concrete surrounds and keystone, a molded concrete cornice with returns, brick quoins, and a slate roof. A wood-frame cupola with a steeple caps the main block. Set on a wood-frame base with quoins, the cupola features arched multi-light double-hung windows with pilasters. The entry wing, accessed on the west elevation, features a molded concrete cornice with returns, a molded concrete entry surround with keystone, and inset wood-paneled double-leaf doors. The side elevations of the main block are detailed with large 20/20 wood windows with paneled spandrels, jack arch lintels and a projecting watertable.

This house has a gable roof that surmounts a rectangular block form. A small gable extension of the roof is located on the west elevation. The original entrance and facade are located on the east elevation; an additional entrance on the south elevation acts as the front door now. The original facade is three bays wide, asymmetrical, with a side passage entrance. The south elevation is three bays wide, also asymmetrical and has a one-bay wide wing with an additional single-leaf entrance. The first story windows are taller than the second story windows throughout, with wide stone lintels and sills that extend beyond the openings. The stairwell is located on the north inside wall. A corner fireplace is found in the northwest corner of the parlor, at the southeast corner of the house; a possible dining or secondary sitting room is located on the other side of the parlor. The wing at the west end was likely used as a kitchen.

This building has a front end gable roof, and is two bays wide and three bays deep. The house is sheathed in clapboard with corner boards, typical of the urban Queen Anne architectural style. The facade is also characteristic of the Queen Anne architectural style with a side front entry and modest double-hung windows in a 2/2 configuration originally. The roof has wide eaves, with a pedimented return at the corners of the front elevation at the gable end. A small window is located above the second story windows in the center of the gable. Entering the house from the southwest corner of the building, one enters a small hallway from which a straight stairwell rises to the second level. To the east is a small living room which presently contains its original carpeting laid by Richard Drew, Dr. Drew's father. To the north of the living room is a dining area followed by a kitchen. On the second level are two bedrooms and a small den in which are located numerous articles of family providence.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Summary Statement

Penrose in central Arlington County, Virginia, was initially platted as the Butler-Holmes Subdivision in 1882 by William H. Butler and Henry Louis Holmes, prominent leaders in the local African American community. Because of its close proximity to the Freedman's Village and the numerous restrictive covenants applied to many of the surrounding communities, Penrose was originally home to a substantial number of newly freed African Americans. Penrose, also known historically as Central Arlington, experienced significant growth after the turn of the 20th century with the arrival of the commuter railways, the advent of the automobile, and the need for housing to support the burgeoning population flocking to the nation's capital. This population surge overwhelmed the largely rural neighborhood of Penrose, altering its demographic make-up and transforming it into a commuting suburb whose boundaries expanded with the increased growth. Although Penrose was originally a small subdivision platted in 1909 along South Fillmore Street, the name eventually became associated with the larger community to the east, which includes an amalgamation of historic residential enclaves developed between 1882 and 1941 united by their shared transportation-related growth patterns and boundaries. Today, the neighborhood of Penrose displays late-19th- and early-20th- century vernacular buildings associated with its initial development as an African American community, coupled with the more modest suburban residential architecture of the 20th century.

Eligible under Criteria A and C of the National Register of Historic Places, the Penrose Historic District has a period of significance extending from 1882 to 1954 and is significant in the areas of architecture, community planning/development, and African American ethnic heritage. Penrose is recognized for its association with prominent African Americans, including former Freedman's Village residents and local leaders William H. Butler and Henry Louis Holmes. Later residents included noted African Americans such as Dr. Charles Drew, who gained international acclaim for his scientific advances in the field of blood plasma transfusion research. Located within the historic district, the Dr. Charles Drew House was listed as a National Historic Landmark in 1976. Furthermore, Penrose is significant for its architectural resources and community planning/development, and its transformation from a rural farming community into a suburban commuter neighborhood of Washington, D.C. In the latter part of the 20th century, additions and minor alterations were made to a few of the buildings in Penrose. These changes do not diminish the overall integrity of the historic district. Typically, the additions are sensitive to the original design, workmanship, materials, and feeling of Penrose as it was initially developed and has continued to evolve as a suburb of Washington, D.C. The area making up the Penrose Historic District, which became defined as a neighborhood based on its transportation arteries, consists of 520 individual properties, including single dwellings, multiple dwellings, a church, and two landscaped parks. Additionally there are 217 outbuildings, including sheds, garages, carpools, picnic pavilion, playgrounds, barbecue pits, basketball courts, swimming pools, and playhouses. There are 477 contributing resources and 259 non-contributing resources.

Criterion A: That are associated with events that have made a significant contribution to the broad patterns of our history.

Penrose meets Criterion A of the National Register of Historic Places as a planned community associated with the historic, economic, and cultural contributions of African American families in Arlington County. After the Civil War, African American families, many of them former slaves, became associated with the government-established Freedman's Village. As residents became assimilated into the work force, many families relocated to nearby communities, such as Nauck, Green Valley, East Arlington, South Washington, and Johnson's Hill, as well as the Butler-Holmes Subdivision, all of which began to cater to African Americans. The disbanding of Freedman's Village by the federal government in the 1890s forced residents to look to surrounding areas for settlement opportunities, further expanding these early African American neighborhoods. Planned development in the area that became Penrose began in 1882 with the establishment of the Butler-Holmes Subdivision by former Freedman's Village residents and local leaders William Butler and Henry Louis Holmes. The neighborhood, along with nearby areas of rural Alexandria, was designed from the onset to attract African American citizens.

Penrose also represents the attraction of the middle- and working-class populations to planned suburban communities with the arrival of the commuter rail lines and the popularity of the automobile. By the early 1900s, the streetcar lines began to allow easy access to Washington, D.C. from outlying areas, essentially opening vast areas to suburban development by the first decade of the 20th century. Much of the city's residential building boom during the period leading up to and between the World Wars, encompassed and expanded much of Arlington County. The suburban communities offered residents an alternative to the older, more dense neighborhoods of Washington, D.C. During this period of unprecedented expansion, the demographics also began to shift. Today, Penrose retains its middle-class heritage as a firmly established multi-cultural and multi-ethnic neighborhood.

Criterion C: That embody the distinctive characteristics of a type, period, or method of construction or that represent the work of a master, or that possess high artistic values, or that represent a significant and distinguishable entity whose components may lack individual distinction.

The suburban neighborhood of Penrose meets Criterion C of the National Register of Historic Places for its substantial concentration of domestic architecture, representing the vernacular, Italianate, Queen Anne, Colonial Revival, and Craftsman styles that were popular throughout America during late 19th and early 20th centuries. Developed as a middle- and working-class African American community, the earliest houses were generally the more vernacular late-19th-century dwellings, which were located in the northern portion of the neighborhood. These large single dwellings were sited on spacious lots with landscaped yards.

Penrose also retains many of its original early-20th-century residential revival and American-movement buildings, the majority of which were designed by local builders or architects. During the early 20th century, house sizes and stylistic features began to change in response to a new clientele of working-class citizens, a trend typical of suburban neighborhoods throughout Arlington and the United States in general. In response, larger numbers of smaller, less ornamented houses were built throughout the neighborhood to house middle- and working-class residents. The dominant styles were modest Colonial Revival dwellings balanced by a substantial number of Craftsman-style bungalows.

Historical Background

Initial Development of Central Arlington

The area known today as Penrose was originally a portion of a large 425-acre tract of land known as Brookdale that was patented to James Robertson in 1724.¹ Extending south almost to Columbia Pike, the southern portion of Brookdale is the site of much of the present Penrose neighborhood, located just to the west of the original Arlington estate. After passing into ownership of the Pearson and Chapman families, Brookdale was acquired in 1851 by Lieutenant Bushrod Washington Hunter, whose family possessed significant land holdings in the area.

Central Arlington, including Penrose, is located in what was originally the rural portion of the ten-square mile parcel of land surveyed in 1791 as the District of Columbia. Primarily consisting of small tobacco farms, the area soon possessed soils that were infertile, causing many farmers to relocate west to what are now Fairfax and Loudoun Counties. Those who remained were encouraged to diversify their agricultural crops. With easy access to Washington, D.C. and Georgetown markets, Penrose and the surrounding neighborhoods in Arlington County became an ideal location for fruit orchards and later truck farming.²

Known as "Alexandria County of the District of Columbia," the land, which included all of present-day Arlington County and part of the City of Alexandria, was returned to the Commonwealth of Virginia in 1846 by the U.S. Congress. Eventually, many of the large tracts that had been retroceded to Virginia were divided into smaller farms and settled by landowners. By the mid-1800s, a large influx of New Yorkers were settling in the area spurred by the mild climate, and proximity to the nation's capital. One such pioneer was Sewell B. Corbett of Corbettsville, New York, who purchased large tracts of land along Columbia Pike anticipating the streetcar lines.

With the invasion of Union troops during the Civil War, many of the local farms were damaged to make way for new roads and military forts. Numerous forts were located within the immediate vicinity of Central Arlington, including Fort McPherson, Fort Craig, and Fort Richardson. Yet, despite the destruction, small settlements began to appear throughout the Arlington area. Originally constructing a home near Fort Berry, the Corbetts relocated and built a home at the corner of Columbia Pike and South Fillmore Street (South Walter Reed Drive) just after the Civil War when their original house was seized by troops. Known as the Corbett-Bradbury House, the wood-frame dwelling was later rented to Colonel John Singleton Mosby, a Confederate Army hero. The dwelling stood until 1948 when it was demolished for the construction of the Fillmore Garden Apartments. Growth of the nation's capital and the surrounding suburbs attracted residents, including former Union soldiers who had camped and maneuvered in the area and chose to remain after the war to establish farms. After President Lincoln's emancipation of slaves in Washington, D.C. in 1862, many sought refuge in the District of Columbia until slavery was abolished in the Confederate states nine months later. The resulting large number of displaced African American persons led to the establishment of Freedman's Village, which opened in December of 1863 on the property of Robert E. Lee's Arlington estate.

Freedman's Village was established by the United States Congress and the Bureau of Refugees, Freedmen, and Abandoned Lands to help African American citizens make the transition from servitude to freedom and from wartime to peace. Beyond the provision of assistance to African Americans, the Bureau maintained a number of settlements throughout the South and bordering states. These settlements began under the wartime supervision of the Union army and were managed by the Quartermaster's Department. Perhaps the most famous of the Freedman's Villages was the community founded in 1863 on the grounds of Arlington House. This village superseded several temporary camps, including Duff Green's Row and Camp Barker in the District of Columbia, becoming a magnet for freed people throughout the area. As a model camp, Freedman's Village attracted widespread attention and support from both the federal government and 19th-century reformers.³ The village proper is presently the site of Arlington Cemetery, the Navy Annex, Henderson Hall, and the complex system of roads that now transverse the area.

The village originally consisted of approximately 100 wood-frame houses that were to temporarily house African Americans. The freedmen were required to work for their wages, saving enough to relocate to permanent housing elsewhere. However, many villagers tended to permanently reside in the community, thus, forcing the government to expand the boundaries and purchase additional acreage outside the village proper. Known as the Arlington Tract, the additional land circumscribed Freedman's Village. Despite attempts to disband the original village, approximately 148 families were documented as residing in the area in 1890. However, some neighborhoods began to develop prior to the closing of Freedman's Village. One such neighborhood was the Butler-Holmes subdivision, originally settled in the 1870s and subdivided in 1882. Other similar developing central Arlington neighborhoods for African Americans included Nauck, Johnson's Hill, Green Valley, and East Arlington, among others. Larger numbers of former Freedman's Village residents relocated to these areas due to the eventual phasing out of the village in the 1890s.

The area along the Columbia Turnpike, which later became the southern boundary of Penrose, showed increasing development prior to the disbanding of Freedman's Village, as it was a major transportation route linking the Long Bridge across the Potomac River with the Little River Turnpike. During the mid-1800s settlement in the area was spurred by the soon to be established streetcar lines.⁴ The county experienced increased growth and access to Washington, D.C. with the opening of the Aqueduct Bridge as a free bridge in 1886 and the establishment of the electric streetcar in the 1890s. The streetcars ran from Rosslyn to Nauck, Rosslyn to Falls Church, and Mount Vernon to Washington, D.C. Real estate developers, many of them investors in the streetcar companies, were promoting new neighborhood communities along these rail lines. Areas developed by the beginning of the 20th century included Addison Heights, Johnson's Hill, Queen City, Nauck, Butler-Holmes, Corbett, Glencarlyn, Bon Air, Fostoria, High View Park, Hall's Hill, Cherrydale, Clarendon, Ballston, Fort Meyer Heights, and Rosslyn.⁵ Increased dependability of the streetcars allowed residents of the Arlington area to work in the District of Columbia and thus, Alexandria County began to be marketed as a commuter suburb.

Developers and real estate agencies advertised that the county allowed both convenience to Washington, D.C. and a healthy, bucolic setting for family life. The 1907 publication, A Brief History of Alexandria County, touted the advantages of the Arlington area's proximity to Washington, D.C.:

A person living in Alexandria County enjoys, free of cost, all of the Government institutions of Washington city, its libraries, its colleges, schools, museums, art galleries, and public buildings and at the same time enjoys the health of country life and escapes all the discomforts of a crowded city.⁶

As all of these changes were occurring, the demographics of Arlington were also rapidly changing. Between 1870 and 1900, the number of residents grew from 3,185 to 6,430. By 1910, the population nearly doubled, growing to 10,231. The growing number of residents was due not only to the increasing number of jobs available through the federal government because of the First World War (1914-1918), but also due to the growth of supporting service industries and retail establishments. Renamed Arlington County in 1920, it was well on its way to becoming "the fastest growing county in the Commonwealth of Virginia, and indeed, for a time, in the United States."⁷ By 1937, Arlington County was touted as "the smallest in area in the state and the fastest growing in population and telephones."⁸

Because of their accessibility to Washington, D.C., desirable suburban location, and proximity to commercial and civic facilities in Arlington, the neighborhoods along Columbia Pike continued to grow steadily into the 20th century. The houses erected during the early years of the development of Penrose included a number of vernacular, Queen Anne, and Italianate-style dwellings constructed primarily of wood frame. Two of the three documented extant masonry dwellings in Arlington County dating prior to 1885 are located in the Penrose neighborhood, with the third located just south of Columbia Pike.

The Evolution of the Penrose Neighborhood

The first impetus for planned growth in Penrose occurred when Henry Louis Holmes and William H. Butler purchased parcels of land just to the west of Fort Meyer. Holmes and Butler were respected African American community leaders, as well as farmers and laborers residing in the nearby Freedman's Village. The men relocated to the future site of Penrose with their families around 1879, and improved their land with substantial freestanding vernacular dwellings.⁹ The neighborhood was ultimately platted in 1882 as the Butler-Holmes Subdivision. It was bounded by what is currently Arlington Boulevard (originally Lee Highway) to the north, Wise Street to the west, Second Street South (originally Shelley Street) to the south, and Fillmore Street (originally Bingham Road) to the west. The subdivision featured an irregular grid plan composed of approximately 171 individual lots.

William H. Butler and Henry Louis Holmes, were two of Freedman's Village's prominent leaders. Each held public office in the county prior to their real estate development ventures. Holmes served as Commissioner of Revenue between 1876 and 1903, as well as being one of the first officers of St. John's Baptist Church located at 1905 Columbia Pike at the corner of South Scott Street.¹⁰ In recognition for his community services, the County named a park for him and his real estate partner, William Butler, in the Penrose neighborhood. An annex to the now demolished county courthouse was also named in his honor. Holmes died in 1905 at age forty-nine. The second home of the Holmes family, erected in 1918, is located at 2803 1st Road South (000-8823-0082). Mrs. Henry Holmes occupied the house until her death in the 1960s. William Butler served as Commissioner of Roads in 1879 and later as Surveyor of Roads in Arlington Magisterial District throughout the 1880s, as well as Superintendent of the Poor. In 1879, Butler constructed a wood-frame vernacular Queen Anne-inspired dwelling at 2407 2nd Street South (000-8823-0093) that continues to be owned by the Butler family.

Despite the subdivision of lots and the expansion of the original tract, the community of Penrose grew slowly during the latter part of the 19th century. G.M. Hopkins's Map of 1878 documents the development along the turnpike in what became Penrose, including the Columbia School and the land holdings of Ellen Crocker, Maggie Crocker, Truman Hull, and J. Bartlett, among others. An 1886 Map of Fairfax County, Virginia, by A.J. Shipman shows increased development north of the turnpike in the vicinity of the Butler-Holmes subdivision, although specific landholders are not specified. Hopkins's 1894 map reveals that Bradbury, a Corbett family relative, occupied the Corbett House, while a store and post office, as well as properties held by Bartlett and Hull, extend eastward along the Pike. The map further reveals that approximately ten dwellings occupied lots in the Butler-Holmes subdivision, while another eight were located just to the north. The map designates the area to the east of what became South Courthouse Road as Arlington Heights. A map by G.P. Strum in 1900 shows the area south of the Butler-Holmes subdivision and north of Columbia Pike divided into approximately fifteen large parcels, although it is unknown how many were occupied by dwellings. The northwest section of the Butler-Holmes subdivision features twenty-six small lots, while the remainder of the tract was divided into six parcels held by the Butler and Holmes families, including William Butler, Henry Holmes, and Joseph Butler. Bertha E. Bradbury (28.94 acres), Emma Hull, Truman Hull (23.17 acres), Sam Potter, Julia Smith, P.P. Lewis, J.P. Lewis, Emma McConville, and Emma Cothren (10.36 acres), the M.E. Church, the post office, and the Columbia School occupied land between Butler-Holmes and Columbia Pike. The portion located to the east between 2nd Street North (Shelley Road) and Columbia Pike remained designated on the map as Arlington Heights.

From the 1890s into the first part of the 20th century, the community saw a substantial population increase as a result of the introduction of the Fort Meyer Branch of the Washington-Alexandria and Falls Church commuter railway that connected the community to Rosslyn, Georgetown, and the District of Columbia. The neighborhood grew into a working-class community with laborers and workers who supported Arlington and Washington, D.C. The streetcar route cut through Penrose along Fillmore and North Second Streets, providing easy access for commuters into Washington, D.C. Hunter Station (000-8823-0505) of the Washington-Virginia Company's streetcar line was located along 2nd Street South (Shelley Road) and the nearby Columbia Station was located at the southeast corner of Columbia Pike and South Fillmore Streets. Seeking refuge from the nation's capital, many Washingtonians began moving out to the more rural landscape that was to become Arlington County in 1920. Because of this accessibility to Washington, D.C., the desirable suburban location, and proximity to commercial and civic facilities, the area of Penrose grew steadily throughout the 20th century. Consequently, the rush of residents to the area required the installation of amenities, new roads, and public transportation. During this period of rapid expansion, a number of subdivision additions were made to the Butler-Holmes community, including the P.P. Lewis and McGowan additions to Arlington Heights in 1890, McConville's addition to Arlington Heights in 1898, the Penrose section in 1909, McConville and Lewis' 1920 addition, and Radio Park in 1923.

In 1910, the Navy Department developed a radio station just to the east of Arlington Avenue (now Conynouse Road) on the property of Fort Meyer, adjacent to the Penrose neighborhood. After an exhaustive search of the Washington, D.C. area, the open space adjacent to Arlington Cemetery on government-owned property was deemed ideal. The Navy constructed two administrative buildings, and a 600-foot and two 450-foot radio towers on the site. The radio station was significant for its 1915 trans-Atlantic voice communication between the Arlington towers and the Eiffel Tower in Paris, the first such long-distance vocal communication of its kind in the world. Two shorter towers were added to the property in 1922, although the original towers were disassembled in 1941 as they posed a threat to aviation travel to and from nearby Washington National Airport. The site continues to serve as a military communications headquarters. Although the station and towers have been historically associated with the neighborhood since their inception, they are located outside the boundaries of the historic district.

In 1914, Arlington County passed a county ordinance mandating approval of new subdivisions by the county engineer. The next county ordinance concerning subdivision control was in April 1930. This ordinance established basic categories for land use.¹¹ However, the ordinance was not under much county government control. As a result, many of the decisions regarding platting, design, aesthetics, and residential character were left up to the real estate agents and builders of Penrose. A 1925 map shows approximately seventy-eight buildings in what is now Penrose, although the label of Penrose on this map extends beyond the original plat and the present neighborhood to the west side of South Fillmore Street (Bingham Road). Twenty-eight of those dwellings are located in the Butler-Holmes section, with the remainder located south of 2nd Street South (Shelley Road). The map also reveals a number of named streets, including Bingham Road, Bradbury Avenue, Cothran Avenue, McConville Street, Grant Avenue, Herman Avenue, Lee Avenue, and Arlington Avenue. Despite this increased growth, the rural nature of the community was retained, featuring open green space, reminiscent of the farming community that historically sustained the area. The open landscape was further accented by the rural nature of the nearby Arlington Cemetery on the original Arlington estate.

The population influx in Penrose included the continued arrival of prominent African Americans such as Dr. Charles Drew (1904-1950), who was renowned for his scientific medical research that led to blood plasma transfusions. He was the first African American to receive a Doctorate of Science in Medicine and won numerous awards for his achievements in blood plasma research. Drew headed the Surgery Department at Howard University, and helped to reduce racial barriers for African Americans. He resided at 2505 1st Street South (000-8823-0072) between 1920 and 1939. The vernacular wood-frame house was designated a National Historic Landmark in 1976 in recognition of Drew's achievements. Descendants of the Drew family continue to reside in the dwelling.

Significant changes occurred in 1930 when Arlington Boulevard was opened along the northern border of the community, creating a major automobile route to Washington, D.C. Coupled with the tremendous World War II-era development needs that arose with the expanded federal government, the construction of many government buildings, including the nearby Pentagon, and increased land values spurred additional population growth. Between 1917 and 1945, central Arlington, which by 1927 was already the most densely populated area of the County, saw its greatest phase of development. The federal government was rapidly expanding and many employees of the New Deal program in the 1930s relocated to Arlington. The high land prices attracted many farmers, who began to sell significant acreage to speculative real estate investors. Additions to Penrose during this period included the Ashton C. Jones subdivision along Arlington Boulevard platted in 1933, B.M. Smith's additions to Arlington Heights in 1936, and Flowers Gardens in 1942, which was previously the property of Belle Mck. Beem.¹² A

Franklin map reveals that the neighborhood was almost completely subdivided by 1938, although a handful of larger properties remained. Owners south of 2nd Street South (Shelley Road) included Luther M. Walter (25.07 acres), B.M. Smith (1.75 acres), Simon L. Sommers (1 acre), B.R. Lyle, Arda P. Klaus (2 acres), W.C. Willis, George E. Fulcher (1 acre), and Belle P. Mck. Beem (5.18 acres). North of 2nd Street South (Shelley Road), the larger tracts, each approximately one acre in size, were held by Ashton C. Jones, W.M. Stone, Charles Hunter, Louise Oliver, J. Irma Butler, Lawrence Butler, M.A. Butler, and John Wauls, while the remainder of the area was subdivided into smaller lots.

The number of Arlington residents continued to grow, with the population reaching 26,615 residents in 1930. This number more than doubled ten years later with a total of 57,040 residents in 1940. Of those employed in 1940, more than forty percent were involved with the government on a local, state, or federal basis. These workers made up the largest group of families and individuals in need of rental housing. The dramatic increase in population during the 1930s and the limited availability of affordable rental housing for middle-class government workers made the county a prime development area.

During this period between the wars, the county's ethnic populations continued to shift. As evidenced by the 1920 and 1930 census records, the majority of the area residents were white, with only six households of African Americans, located primarily along Shelly Road (2nd Street South) and throughout the original Butler-Holmes subdivision area. The middle- and- working-class residents, as evidenced by a sampling of the 1930 U.S. Census (which designates Penrose as a separate entity for the first time), included John E. Waula (plasterer), Lucy Williams (cook), Claude Withower (clerk), Edmund Flauherty (painter), Louis Cook (chauffeur), George Daniels (painter/contractor), John Best (lunchroom counterman), Robert Bergdorf (carpenter), Roy Rainoley (soldier), and Carroll Humphries (auto mechanic), among others. Additional occupations listed in the census included plumber, doctor, railroad telegrapher, merchant, salesman, and numerous U.S. government employees, among others.

Late-Twentieth-Century Development in Penrose

After the close of World War II, residential neighborhoods like Penrose continued to develop at an increasing rate throughout Arlington County. As a whole, the country was impacted by the following conditions: an unprecedented rise in automobile use and relative decline of mass transit; the evolution of regional shopping centers; and the presence of defense communities with a need for additional housing. Arlington County, an established commuter suburb of the nation's capital, followed the national model, and buildings constructed during this housing boom were generally without significant ornamentation. The lack of detailing and grand form allowed for quick inexpensive construction using readily available materials, marking a shift in the building practices originally established in the community.

Most of the neighborhood's commercial buildings lie to the south of the historic district along Columbia Pike and were primarily constructed during the mid-to-late 20th century, fueled by the increased population between the wars. The main commercial corridor stretches along the southern boundary and beyond, and includes restaurants, grocery stores, and other retail establishments that service the Penrose community and the automobile traffic along Columbia Pike. Several of the original storefront buildings remain standing today, including the building historically associated with Fillmore Gardens. The neighborhood's perimeter, just outside the district boundaries along Columbia Pike and South Courthouse Road, has experienced mid-to-late-20th-century non-historic townhouse and apartment development, as well as corporate development with companies such as Canon, located near the corner of Arlington Boulevard and South Courthouse Road.

Trinity Episcopal Church was constructed in the southeast corner of the Penrose neighborhood in 1957. This non-historic church is the successor congregation to Arlington's first house of worship, the Chapel of Ease at Arlington estate, which was constructed by George Washington Parke Custis circa 1825. The building was burned during the Civil War and the congregation constructed a new church at South Wayne Street and Columbia Pike in the first quarter of the 20th century. The current building standing on the lot is important for its location and long-standing association with the neighborhood, as well as its architectural significance as a Colonial Revival-style church.

Infill construction, reaching a highpoint in the 1960s, has continued through the following decades to the present. Mostly consisting of late-20th- and early-21st-century townhouse enclaves and single-family residences, infill housing scattered throughout the community has remained compatible in scale and detailing with its historic counterparts. Commercial development, encouraged by the popularity of the automobile, became the most substantial transition to affect many of Arlington's early suburbs. Columbia Pike serves as a visual boundary of Penrose, with commercial development screening the majority of the detached residential community from rapidly passing motorists. The non-historic and commercial development is not included in the historic district boundaries. Similarly, a substantial hedgerow and vehicular access road visually separate the community from the Arlington Boulevard transportation corridor that forms the northern boundary. Despite its location near these major transportation routes, the Penrose neighborhood has escaped the effects of encroaching commercial interests within the neighborhood boundaries. The northeast boundary of the community borders a 1980s office complex and a 7-11 convenience store, which was erected on the historic site of a gas station. Penrose, now located in the center of Arlington County, has the added advantage of easy access to interstate highways, Washington, D.C., and medical, commercial, and cultural areas of the region, without being directly affected.

Census data statistics from 1990 and 2000 reveal that, although Penrose shifted from a primarily African American population base during the early-to-mid-1900s, the community currently retains its strong multi-ethnic-based ties. Based on a total of 2,055 households in both owner and rental housing units, the population statistics for 2000 include a roughly fifty-one percent white population, while the remainder of the population is sixteen percent African American, ten percent Asian, and almost twenty percent Hispanic or Latino.¹³

A few of the modest single-family dwellings were renovated in the latter part of the 20th century to better accommodate the growing population. The alterations included rear additions, side wings, and the enclosing of porches. New materials introduced include vinyl-sash windows, and aluminum and vinyl siding. However, despite the alterations and minor additions that have occurred in Penrose, and throughout the Metropolitan Washington area, the majority of the features that illustrate the building's original style in terms of massing, spatial relationship, proportion, pattern of windows and doors, texture of materials, and ornamentation are largely intact. When determining the contributing/non-contributing status of these altered buildings, it was determined that small-scale additions to the side and rear of the buildings did not diminish the appearance of the original design, massing or proportion of the historic structure. It was also determined that the replacement of wood-sash windows with vinyl-sash windows, or the replacement of weatherboard with vinyl siding also did not detract from the original design, massing, proportion, or ornamentation. As the form, significant features, and detailing of the buildings located within the Penrose neighborhood are visible and not obscured, they were considered to be contributing resources to the historic district.

Today, Penrose stands as a quiet multi-cultural residential community conveniently located near Arlington's major transportation routes. In 1995, the larger Central Arlington area was divided into smaller individual neighborhoods based on their geographical and community-derived boundaries. Although Penrose was originally a small subdivision platted in 1909 along South Fillmore Street, the name eventually became associated with the larger community to the east, which includes an amalgamation of historic residential enclaves platted between 1882 and 1941, united by their shared transportation-related growth patterns and boundaries. Enhanced by tree-lined streetscapes, landscaped lots, and fashionable architectural trends,

Verbal Boundary Description

The Penrose Historic District is located in central Arlington, Virginia. The community is bordered by the residential neighborhoods of Lyon Park the north, Arlington Heights and Fillmore Garden Apartments to the west, the Fort Meyer military property to the east, and the Columbia Pike commercial corridor to the south. Physical boundaries, defined by major transportation routes, include Arlington Boulevard to the north, South Fillmore Street and South Barton Street to the west, South Wise Street and South Courthouse Road to the east, and Columbia Pike to the south. The residential neighborhood currently occupies approximately 125 acres, created by the amalgamation of twelve individual plats dating between 1882 and 1941.

Boundary Justification

The boundaries of the Penrose Historic District generally follow the outline established by the joining of twelve subdivision plats submitted to the Arlington County Land Records Office between 1882 and 1941. A shared development history and delineation within major transportation routes unite these plats. The boundaries of the historic district exclude the buildings constructed east of South Wise Street, the original boundary of the Butler-Holmes plat, as the area includes non-historic townhouses, a modern office complex, and modern commercial buildings. South Courthouse Road, a major transportation route, serves as the neighborhood's eastern boundary, except between 2nd Street South and 6th Street South where twin dwellings were developed on the eastern side as part of the neighborhood circa 1940. The remainder of the eastern side of South Courthouse Road has been excluded, as the U.S. Naval Radio Station occupies much of this property. Although the location of the station and its evolution are important, it is not directly associated with the development of the Penrose neighborhood. The multiple-family apartment buildings along South Courthouse Road and 2nd Street South have also been excluded, as Penrose initially developed as a single-family residential community encompassing freestanding and twin dwellings. The apartment buildings and garden apartments post-date the single-family residential development and are located along the edges of the neighborhood. Additionally, a circa 1960 high-rise building on the western side of South Courthouse Road and one at the corner of Columbia Pike are non-historic apartment complexes that are not consistent in form, date of construction, style, and type to the contributing resources of Penrose. Along Columbia Pike, the southern boundary, a non-historic church has been included in the district as it occupies the lot where a former church stood, which had an historic association with the neighborhood. South Fillmore Street, originally serviced by the streetcar line, forms the western boundary at the northern end. Those properties fronting the western side of South Barton Street are included within the residential community. Fillmore Garden Apartments was excluded as the garden-apartment complex developed as a separate entity from the single- and multiple-family improvements within Penrose. Further, the apartment complex was developed between 1941 and 1948, after Penrose had been subdivided.
