NARRATIVE DESCRIPTION

Summary Description:

Located at the south end of the town of Orange, the county seat of Orange County, Virginia, the Chestnut Hill dwelling was completed ca. 1860. The house, a frame structure standing two stories high over a low brick foundation, was built on a central-passage, double-pile plan. Representing a combination of the Italianate and Greek Revival styles, the structure originally had a low roof that was replaced with a mansard roof in 1891, adding an attic story as well as an element of the then-popular Second Empire style to the house. Threatened by the construction of a school access road, in 2003 the house was saved by the current owners who moved it in one piece approximately 150 feet southwest to a compatible new site that was once part of the same tract of land. The one remaining secondary building, a small shed, was also moved intact to the new site.

Detailed Description:

The site is a roughly 3-acre parcel carved from the original property. A steep drive rises from Route 15 (Caroline Street) just south of the intersection with Route 20 (Berry Hill Road) toward the house, which faces east, in its historic orientation toward Route 15.

The Chestnut Hill house was built ca. 1860 as the residence of local businessman and politician Alexander Daley. Chestnut Hill was originally constructed in the Italianate and Greek Revival styles. The two-story house was built of heavy frame construction over a low brick foundation laid in a variable course American-bond pattern. The two interior chimneys are laid in plain stretcher bond, embellished by decorative inset panels that would have been visible above the original low roofline. The remains of pigment still visible on the chimney bricks in the present attic indicate that the chimneys were originally covered with a red wash. Measuring approximately 44 feet- 4 inches wide by 34 feet-6 inches deep, the house has a broad central stair passage flanked on either side by front and rear rooms of approximate equal size. The original windows consist of paired four-over-four-light, double-hung-sash, wood windows on the front (east) elevation, and six-over-six-light, double-hung-sash, wood windows on the sides and rear of house. Both the first-story front door and the second-story door (which opens onto the roof of the front porch) are double-leaf doors flanked by sidelights. The original exterior window trim on the front and sides of the house includes pediments over all first-floor windows, simpler molded board trim over the second-story windows, and consoles under each window sill.

The central, one-story, one-bay porch shelters the front door and has a balustraded deck above. The porch is embellished with paneled square posts and pilasters, scroll-sawn balusters, and decorative brackets similar to those at the eaves. Balustraded decks with the same scroll-sawn balusters extends to either side of the central porch, running the full length of the house. An early-20th-century photograph indicates that the porch formerly extended to the front (east) of the house approximately twice its present length.¹ This porch was cut back to its present dimensions in the mid-twentieth century, when concrete and brick porch steps were added.

In 1891, the original roof was replaced by the present mansard roof and the chimney stacks were extended, giving a Second Empire flavor to the original Italianate/Greek Revival structure. Based on early shingles found in the attic, the steep lower slope of Chestnut Hill's mansard roof was originally covered with fish-scale shingles painted blue, perhaps in imitation of slate. The flatter upper slope of the mansard was covered with standing-seam metal as evidenced by portions of the earlier roof that had survived in deteriorated condition. One-over-one-light, double-hung-wood, sash windows were added to light the attic of the new mansard story, which was originally unfinished.

Around the same time as the addition of the new roof, a one-story bay was added to the northwest first-story room; this feature has simple Colonial Revival trim and two-over-two-light, double-hung-sash, wood windows. An early-twentieth-century photograph of Chestnut Hill shows an early two-story, gable-roofed, frame rear wing on the house. More modest in scale and execution than the front portion of the house, this section, known as "the annex," may have been used as a service wing. A porch and several small rooms (a two-story addition containing bathrooms, and a one-story kitchen wing) were built onto the rear of the house as well.² These rear additions, as well as the annex and a separate outbuilding (possibly a kitchen/servants' quarter) were demolished during the Cassell ownership in the late 1950s, at which time a new one-story porch was built across the rear of the house. Also at this time, the southwest first-story room was converted into a kitchen, and two bathrooms were inserted into sections of upstairs rooms.³

Following the house's move out of the path of a new school access road in 2003, the brick foundation was rebuilt to replicate its original appearance, and a new, sympathetic rear wing was added to the house, replacing the late 1950s porch that had been removed prior to the move.

The historic floor plan is a double-pile center-passage plan with two interior chimneys serving four fireplaces on each floor. A large cased opening in the center passage separates the entry vestibule from the stair hall. A parlor and dining room occupy the front two primary spaces, while a second parlor (or family room) and modern kitchen are in the rear half of the historic first floor. A modest rear addition completed in 2006 encloses expanded kitchen functions and a powder room on the first floor and a small bedroom on the second floor. The building is served by a central stair that is supported by a paneled wall. The balustrade has stained wood handrail, straight balusters, and turned newels. On the second floor the center passage is flanked by two bedrooms on the north and a master bedroom and three small bath rooms on the south. The master bathroom retains the historic fireplace and hearth.

The interior woodwork of the house has been changed very little over time; most of the original robust door and window trim, baseboards, simple Italianate- and Greek Revival-style mantels, and heavy turned stair newel posts have survived intact. The typical historic wood doors have five panels and Italianate casings. Crown moldings were absent from the original construction, but were installed by a previous owner, probably in the mid-20th century. Between the dining room and kitchen and between the two north bedrooms, there are closets, which appear to be original, built into the walls flanking the fireplaces.

A small, one-story, single-bay, 19th-century contributing shed with a hipped wood-shingled roof and weatherboard siding was relocated to a spot close to the northwest corner of the house, replicating the relationship this historic secondary structure had with the house.

SUMMARY STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Located at the southern end of the town of Orange on an approximate 3-acre site, Chestnut Hill was built ca. 1860 as a fashionable Italianate/Greek Revival dwelling for local businessman and politician Alexander Daley. Daley, an Irish immigrant, had come to the village of Orange in the 1840s and founded a tanyard, leather dealership, and shoe factory. His operations prospered, and Daley became an important member of the local business community. Daley's Chestnut Hill is one of only a dozen residences in the town to survive from the antebellum era and is one of the best preserved of these dwellings. In 1883, Daley sold the property to Reuben Conway Macon and his wife Emma Cassandra Macon. A Civil War veteran, great-nephew of President James Madison, and town postmaster, R. C. Macon lived at Chestnut Hill until his death in 1927, and the property remained in the Macon family home until the 1940s. With the exception of the mansard roof added by the Macons in 1891, the original portion of the house has remained little altered. Chestnut Hill is representative of the types of residences constructed and inhabited by well-to-do businessmen and influential local families as the town of Orange developed from a small crossroads county seat to a significant regional town in the mid-nineteenth century. It is eligible for listing in the National Register under Criterion C at the local level for architectural significance because it is a rare example in Orange County of an Italianate/Greek Revival house evolving into a Second Empire-style house. The period of significance begins ca. 1860 with the date of its construction and ends in 1891 with the addition of the mansard roof. In 2003, in order to preserve Chestnut Hill from demolition resulting from a road construction project, the current owners moved the house and a small shed, both intact, 150 feet from the original site to a parcel carved out from the original property. The house and shed were rehabilitated by the current owners in accordance with the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for Rehabilitation, with careful attention toward retaining architectural integrity and reproducing the buildings' orientations and the character of the site. The goal and result of the relocation was that Chestnut Hill's historic interior and exterior features have been preserved. The house on its new location has the same orientation and topography as its original site. This move plan was pre-approved by the Virginia Department of Historic Resources, and the property also meets the requirements of Criterion Consideration B. In most respects, Chestnut Hill house retains its historic late-nineteenth-century appearance.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

In 1860, Alexander Daley purchased a lot of approximately 11 acres located at the southern edge of the village of Orange Courthouse. Daley's lot was one of two lots cut from the northern portion of the Howard Place plantation (now known as Mayhurst) by Col. John Willis, who had recently built an elaborate residence for himself on his property. Col. Willis sold the second, adjoining, lot to the vestry of St. Thomas Episcopal Church for a rectory; on the 11-acre lot Daley built Chestnut Hill. Daley subsequently purchased, also from Col. Willis, an additional 31 acres to the west of the Chestnut Hill house tract, which served him as a small farm.

Born in Ireland, Daley arrived in Orange County in the 1840s. He married Sarah Brent in Orange in January 1847 and by the late 1840s had set up a tanyard just north of the lot where Chestnut Hill stands. Chestnut Hill reportedly took its name from the groves of chestnut trees which stood on the property; tanbark from these trees was used by Daley in his tannery. In addition to his tanyard, Daley also operated a leather dealership and shoe factory at the site.

Alexander Daley was perhaps the most persistent among a small group of local businessmen who lobbied for the incorporation of the town of Orange. An 1855 effort, possibly fueled by the extension of the Orange & Alexandria Railroad to Orange the previous year, culminated in a group of local men, including Daley, being authorized by the Virginia General Assembly to hold elections for town trustees (i.e., town council), but this failed to win the requisite written support of a majority of voters in the town. A subsequent effort undertaken in 1870-1871 was successful: Daley was again among those authorized to hold an election for trustees of the town. He was the only man authorized to participate in this capacity in both the 1855 and 1871 efforts. The town was incorporated and elections for the first town council were held in 1872.

Following the death of his first wife in the early 1860s, Alexander Daley married Sarah J. Rawlings, daughter of local hotel keeper Richard Rawlings, in May 1863. Several years after the death of his second wife in 1881, the aging Alexander Daley sold the Chestnut Hill house tract and the adjoining small farm to Reuben Conway Macon, a great-nephew of President James Madison, in trust for Macon's wife Emma Cassandra Macon. R. C. Macon, a Confederate veteran who had served in the 13th Virginia Infantry, had been partly disabled from a shoulder wound received at the Wilderness in May, 1864. In addition to farming at family properties, including his small farm at Chestnut Hill, he also served as postmaster for the town of Orange in 1885-1889.

The Macons kept the Italianate/Greek Revival Daley residence largely intact, with the exception of replacing the original low roof with a then-fashionable mansard roof ca. 1891, and also adding a small bay to the north side of the house around the same time. Both of the Macons resided at Chestnut Hill for the rest of their lives; R. C. Macon died in 1927 and Emma C. Macon in 1942. The house subsequently passed to one of the Macon sons, Clifton Macon, who sold the Chestnut Hill house tract, then comprising the original house tract and an additional five acres, to R. Mason Nalle in 1943. The Nalle heirs sold the property, then reduced to 7.5 acres, to Mr. and Mrs. James Thomas Walker in 1948.

The Walkers deeded Chestnut Hill to Mr. and Mrs. Henry G. Cassell in 1956. Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Schendel purchased the property in 1977.

After discussions in 2002 between the Orange County Board of Supervisors, the Orange County School Board, and the Orange Town Council, it was agreed that the new county middle school would be built within the town limits, near the site of the present Prospect Heights Middle School, provided that the town would provide an access road to the site. The town identified what it considered to be the only feasible route for the new road—through the site occupied by Chestnut Hill. The town government acquired the Chestnut Hill property in May, 2003, and the house was slated for demolition. However, after an outpouring of protests from area residents and organizations, the Town Council opted to sell the house to someone who would move it from the path of the planned roadway by August 1, 2003. A portion of the house tract was offered for the house's new location.

In June 2003, Mr. and Mrs. Troy Ayers acquired the house and the 2.95 acre residue of the original house tract with the intention of moving the house to save it from demolition. In July 2003 the house was moved to a new site on the same tract of land, approximately 150 feet southwest of the original site, on the same orientation and on similar topography. The rehabilitation of the house was certified by the Virginia Department of Historic Resources and the National Park Service as being in conformance with the Secretary of the Interior's Standards for rehabilitation. Chestnut Hill will be operated as an inn.

Chestnut Hill is the only property individually listed in Orange County that features a house that evolved from the Italianate/Greek Revival style to the Second Empire style. Unlike many of Orange County's listed properties, which represent the Federal style, such as Greenwood or Wood Park, or reflect a strong Jeffersonian influence, such as the Ballard-Marshall House and Berry Hill, Chestnut Hill reflects the mid-19th-century popularity of the Italianate and Greek Revival styles, similar to Burlington, the more formal house George Stockdon built for James Barbour in Barboursville. Some thirty years after Alexander Daley built Chestnut Hill in the Italianate/Greek Revival style, R. C. and Emma Macon, the apparently fashion-conscious owners of Chestnut Hill from the 1880s until Mrs. Macon's death in 1943, responded to the craze for the Second Empire style by building a mansard roof on the house in 1991.

Recognized by the community for its significance, the house has been preserved with its exterior Second Empire features and its Greek Revival-style and Italianate interior woodwork intact. Mansard roofs were constructed on (or on sections of) a number of substantial Orange County houses during the second half of the 19th century, including Rocklands, Hawfield, Mount Sharon, and Cameron Lodge.⁴ Of these, only Chestnut Hill survives, and it, along with Manual Level near Barboursville (with a late mansard roof added ca. 1915 to an 1815 plantation house) remain to illustrate this style in the county.⁵

GEOGRAPHICAL DATA

Verbal Boundary Description

The nominated property is all of the property remaining in the historic Chestnut Hill house tract; parcel 044A400210001A. The 2.953-acre parcel was created following the construction of the school access road as shown on the attached Orange County Tax Map, obtained from Orange County, Virginia's GIS website <http://www.onlinegis.net/VaOrange/asp/map.asp>

Boundary Justification

The boundaries enclose the current Chestnut Hill house tract of 2.953 acres which is a portion of the original 1860 Chestnut Hill house tract and historically associated with the house.
