Describe the present and original (if known) physical appearance

Wyoming is a two-story, five-bay frame house set on a Flemish-bond underpinning and flanked by tall Flemish-bond brick chimneys with a single set of stepped weatherings each. The building is clad with plain weatherboards, which replace original beaded weatherboarding, and is fitted with 9/9 sash on the first floor and 6/9 sash on the second. Relatively modern gable-roofed porches, which may replace earlier porches of similar form, shelter both entrances. The whole is covered with a clipped gable roof with a standing-seam sheet metal surface and modillion cornice. At the north end is a modern one-story, two-bay frame kitchen wing which replaces an earlier wing of uncertain date. At the south end is a shed covering the basement entrance.

Wyoming has a simple central-passage, single-pile plan which is unusual principally for its outsized proportions. It is fifty-five feet long and twenty-five feet deep. Normally houses of this sort are forty-five to fifty feet long and not much more than twenty feet deep. This large scale is maintained in the vertical dimensions as well; the first-floor ceilings are over eleven feet high.

The interior decoration also contributes to the large-scale effect. In the hall (south room), the high raised-panel wainscoting is complemented by a broad chimney breast that reaches almost to the ceiling. It consists of an architrave frame which surrounds the fireplace and is flanked by shelf-height fluted pilasters. A frieze consisting of raised panels interspersed with fluted consoles which support the molded shelf completes the lower half of the chimney breast. The upper half, also enframed by fluted pilasters, has a central molded panel enclosing another square molded panel with a broken triangular pediment with a wall-of-Troy cornice and punch-and-dentil rake molding. This overmantel arrangement is flanked by vertical rectangular raised panels. A molded cornice caps the entire chimney breast.

The passage is thirteen feet wide--about four feet wider than is usual, yet the stair is entirely enclosed and projects into the north room. It is entered through doors from both the passage and the north room. The passage is decorated with raised-panel wainscoting and a pedestal chair rail, as in the hall, and has a beaded nailboard encircling it as well.

Raised-panel wainscoting is also employed in the north room. The chimney breast here, which was similar to that in the hall, was cut off at shelf height many years ago. The remaining section has four frieze panels and fluted pilasters with reeds in the flutes. A panel chimneypiece in the second-floor north room is a modern copy.

The house is dramatically sited on the edge of a narrow plateau overlooking the bottom lands of the Pamunkey River. The setting is completely rural, consisting mostly of open fields but with trees along the river and adjoining creeks. No modern intrusions are nearby.

Statement of Significance (in one paragraph)

Wyoming's large wooden dwelling house is representative of the extensive rebuilding of rural Virginia that took place after the Revolution. By the end of the 18th century many Colonial houses were replaced with larger, better-built structures or were heavily remodeled, and many altogether new houses were built to serve the newly established farms carved out of the large old plantations. Architecturally the house maintains the traditional Virginia-Georgian flavor of earlier decades, however it departs from the norm with its exceptionally generous proportions. Exterior dimensions and rooms sizes are all considerably greater than similar Tidewater houses built either before or after the Revolution. Indeed, Wyoming may be the largest house of its plan type (hall-parlor, center-passage) in Virginia. The house is further distinguished by its elegant detailing, including its exterior modillion cornice and interior trim. The paneled chimneypiece in the main room, though somewhat provincial, is one of the most elaborate of its type in the region. The house was built around 1800 for the Hoomes family, large landowners in the western Tidewater. Wyoming is a corruption of the Delaware Indian word, for "at" or "upon the plain." Its choice as the property's name may arise from its site or be an allusion to the Wyoming Valley of Pennsylvania where a Revolutionary battle was fought.

John Hoomes of Caroline County bought the Wyoming tract from Thomas R. Rootes in 1796. Since Rootes lived in Caroline County, it is unlikely that the present house was built during his tenure, and the architectural evidence suggests that it could not have been erected any earlier. John Hoomes is the apparent builder of the house, erected for his son George W. Hoomes. The elder Hoomes lived at Bowling Green Farm (now known as Old Mansion) in Caroline County. Interestingly, when he built Wyoming he chose to imitate the modillion cornice and the somewhat out-of-date clipped gables of his own mid-18th-century brick house.

George W. Hoomes died in 1802 at the age of 23, and the property remained in his father's ownership until 1804, when it was inherited by George Hoomes's minor son John Waller Hoomes. The younger Hoomes died in 1833, and the property was sold six years later to Dr. Arthur Brockenbrough of Tappahannock, who sold it to a father and son, Thomas C. and Benjamin Day Nelson. A plat made in 1839 at the time of the sale represents the first appearance of the name Wyoming. The Nelsons owned Wyoming until 1914 when the Atkinson family, the current owners, purchased it.

in a straight line to the NW side of 615; thence following said side NE for about 550' to point of origin.

The register bounds have been drawn as an irregular quadrilateral defined on the southeast by route 615, on the northeast by a driveway and an imaginary line extending from it, and on the northwest and southwest by lines roughly following the fifty-foot contour line, which marks a steep drop-off to a ravine below. This acreage includes the site of an early kitchen northwest of the house, the probable sites of other, unidentified domestic outbuildings, and two modern corrugated-metal farm buildings shown on the U.S.G.S. 7½' Studley, Va. quadrangle.
