DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

The small village of Lunenburg has changed little in size or appearance since ante-bellum times. The present population is still around forty. Dominating the village is the imposing court house -- a two-story, brick temple-form building fronted by a tetrastyle Roman Doric portico. As originally built, the court house was only four bays deep, but in 1939 it was extended back two additional bays to accommodate the clerk's office. The interior of the court house originally was arranged similar to other court houses of the period, having a two-story courtroom with a rear gallery. Around 1850, the courtroom was divided into two floors and the double flight of stairs leading up to the second floor was placed under the portico at that time.

To the west of the court house is a colonial style story-and-a-half brick structure built in 1938 that now houses the county office of the State Health Department. This building is one of many similar structures built at court houses throughout the State through the generosity of Mr. David K. Bruce. On the east side of the court house is a large, hipped-roofed frame house which was once a tavern known as the Lunenburg State Inn. Portions of this building were built as a residence before the town was laid out. Directly across the road from the court house is an early-nineteenth-century frame structure known as the Hotel Gary. Now in poor condition, this building has at various times accommodated a store, inn, post office, and residence. In addition to these chief structures the village also contains a sprinkling of other nineteenth-century buildings and outbuildings.

In its situation on high ground with surrounding cleared lands, the village presents a picturesque scene, especially from the south where the court house and its gleaming white pediment can be clearly seen above the smaller structures clustered about it.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

Under the authority of an act of the Lunenburg County Court of May, 1782, the location of the court house was designated to be in a "convenient place at or near the center of the county". Shortly afterwards, the exact site was selected and the plans were approved, but the two-room frame court house was not completed until 1787. Despite earlier fears that the geographical center of the county would be remote from the majority of the inhabitants, the new location of the court gained enough in importance so that in 1816 the place became an incorporated village named Lewiston in honor of Captain Lewis L. Taylor, who fell in the War of 1812. The new name did not last, however, for the village continues to be called Lunenburg Court House. Some thirty lots were laid out around the court house square and were sold off by the town's trustees.

By 1823, it was decided that the 1787 court house should be moved and replaced by a more substantial building. The citizens of Lunenburg seemed to be envious of neighboring Charlotte County's handsome new Roman Revival court house, for the commissioners appointed to supervise the construction of a new building were ordered "to advertise in the public papers that they will until the 20th day of December meet at Lunenburg Courthouse to receive proposals for building a new courthouse at this place which courthouse is proposed to be built after the plan of the new courthouse in Charlotte County". The new court house was completed by 1827, for in March of that year the Court was ordered to "hold its sitting therein".

Unfortunately neither the designer nor the builders of the court house were recorded, but the academic quality of the building's classical proportions and detail clearly indicates that the designer was knowledgeable in architecture and was familiar with Thomas Jefferson's Roman Revivalism. One of the handsomest of Virginia's numerous Roman-style court houses, the temple-form Lunenburg Court House stands as visible evidence of Jefferson's influence on the architecture of the State's public buildings. The architectural quality of the court house is much enhanced by the maintenance of its historic setting. The conservative growth of the village of Lunenburg has resulted in the preservation of one of Virginia's most picturesque court house communities. The court house still visually dominates the tiny community and the surrounding countryside as it has for nearly a century and a half.
